ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call up the unfinished business of last suspension day, being the bill reported from the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to ask the House to consider the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am in favor of this, but not until this other matter is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], as a matter of privilege, calls up the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This is suspension day and the general understanding has been that the pension bill would be called up. Now if the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the interstate-commerce bill, will not that necessarily drive over the general pension bill?

The SPEAKER. The House does not go into Committee of the Whole on the interstate-commerce bill. There is a conference report on that bill, and that, under the rules of the House, is a matter of the highest privilege. If the House refuse to consider it, or if the House complete the consideration of the conference report, then the motion to suspend the rules will be in order. The third Monday in the month is not set apart for the suspension of the rules. The rules simply provide that it shall be in order on that day to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the House refuse to consider the conference report, then we can get at the pension bill?

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to say. When any privileged matter is presented the House must decide whether it will consider it or not.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the conference report is taken up and the day is consumed in the consideration of it, will not that compel the unfinished business of last suspension day to be postponed for one month?

The SPEAKER. As a matter of course.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And I desire to inquire further whether the consideration of this conference report is not in order on any day after this?

Mr. MATSON. I desire to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. It has been raised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON]. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

A bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. PETERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to ask what committee will be next in order under the call.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Patents was called, and the bill was under consideration.

Mr. PETERS. What will be the next committee in order.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Invalid Pensions. The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the conference report?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 53 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This conference report, as I understand, is a matter of privilege which may be brought up on any other day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 137, not voting 69; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

FORT BERTHOLD RESERVATION, DAKOTA.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 11th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a copy of an agreement duly made under the provisions of the act of May 15, 1886 (24 Stat., page 44) with the Indians residing upon the Fort Berthold reservation, in Dakota, for the cession of a portion of their reservation in said Territory, and for other purposes.

The agreement, together with the recommendations of the Department, is presented for the action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 17, 1887.

DEFICIENCIES ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting deficiencies estimates made for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PATENTS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now call up the unfinished business of the last suspension day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4458) to limit the jurisdiction of United States courts in patent cases, and to protect persons who, without notice, are bona fide manufacturers, purchasers, venders, and users of articles, machines, machinery, and other things for the exclusive use, manufacture, or sale of which a patent has been or may hereafter be granted.

The SPEAKER. On the third Monday of last month, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moved to suspend the rules and pass this bill. The time for debate upon the motion had been exhausted when the House adjourned. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question having been put, the SPEAKER said: The noes seem to have it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to avoid waste of time, I now call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAND. If in order, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the United States district and circuit courts shall have no jurisdiction to hear or to try any case arising from the actual use of any patent right, or its infringement by such use, by any person in or citizen of the United States or the Territories, wherein the amount in controversy does not exceed $200 against one person or citizen.

SEC. 2. That purchasers of any patent right for actual use shall not be liable to damages, royalty, or for value of the same, or for infringing the same in any manner, who at the date of such purchase had no knowledge of the claims of any third person, or that the inventor of the same has an interest therein adverse to the seller thereof. That no person who shall in good faith purchase, use, manufacture, or sell, without previous knowledge of the existence of a patent therefor, any article, machine, machinery, or other thing for the exclusive use, sale, or manufacture of which any patent has been or hereafter may be granted to any person, persons, or corporation whatever, shall be liable, in damages or otherwise, for an infringement of such patent until after written notice of the existence thereof shall have been personally served on such person or persons or corporation, as the case may be, and such infringement shall be thereafter continued.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall affect any pending suit or proceeding in any of the courts of the United States or in any court of any of the several States.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 156, not voting 82; as follows:

RESIGNATION OF HON. ROBERT S. GREEN.

Mr. MCADOO. I present the following letter of resignation from my colleague, which I ask to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1887.

DEAR SIR: I have forwarded to the governor of New Jersey my resignation as Representative of the United States for the Third Congressional district of New Jersey, to take effect this day.

Permit me to personally thank you for your uniform kindness and courtesy, and to express the hope that your life may long be spared and the country long enjoy the benefit of your ripe experience and valued services.

Yours truly,

ROBT. S. GREEN.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

The letter was laid upon the table.

DEPENDENT PARENTS AND HONORABLY DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. MATSON. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move that the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in considering the pension claims of dependent parents, the fact and cause of death, and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children, having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such parent or parents are without other present means of support than their own manual labor or the contributions of others not legally bound for their support: Provided, That no pension allowed under this act shall commence prior to its passage, and in case of applications hereafter made under this act the pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office.

SEC. 2. That all persons who served three months or more in the military or naval service of the United States in any war in which the United States has been engaged, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from mental or physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits or gross carelessness, which incapacitates them for the performance of labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, and who are dependent upon their daily labor for support shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide in pursuance of this act, be placed on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive, for such total inability to procure their subsistence by daily labor, $12 per month; and such pension shall commence from the date of the filing of the application in the Pension Office, upon proof that the disability then existed, and continue during the existence of the same in the degree herein provided: Provided, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Pension Office, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such forms as he may prescribe, receive the benefits of this act; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to allow more than one pension at the same time to the same person or pension to commence prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That rank in the service shall not be considered in applications filed thereunder.

SEC. 3. That no agent, attorney, or other person instrumental in the presentation and prosecution of a claim under this act shall demand or receive for his services or instrumentality in presenting and prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $5, payable only upon the order of the Commissioner of Pensions, by the pension agent making payment of the pension allowed, except in cases heretofore prosecuted before the Pension Office, when, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Pensions, a fee of $10 may be allowed in like manner to the agent or attorney of record in the case at the date of the passage of this act; and any agent, attorney, or other person instrumental in the prosecution of a claim under this act who shall demand or receive a sum greater than that herein provided for, for his services in the prosecution of the claim, shall be subject to the same penalties as prescribed in section 4 of the act of July 4, 1884, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes."

SEC. 4. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby modified so that the same shall not apply to this act: Provided, That this act shall not apply to those persons under political disabilities. And no person shall be pensioned under this act for any disability incurred while engaged in the military service against the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COWLES. Yes; I demand a second.

Mr. MATSON. I ask consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. COWLES. I can not yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. MATSON and Mr. COWLES.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 128, noes 13.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the tellers will retain their places.

The House further divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 150, noes 17.

So there was a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the motion and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] as controlling the time in support of the motion and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] as controlling the time in opposition to it.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the debate on this bill be extended to thirty minutes on each side instead of fifteen. I know several gentlemen who wish to be heard on it.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BLOUNT objected.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire before the debate begins to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fourth section. It evidently is intended to exclude from the provisions of this bill those whose disabilities were incurred in the naval as well as the confederate military service. Ought not, then, the words "or naval" to be inserted after the word "military?"

Mr. MATSON. Under the law the word "military" includes the naval branch of the service.

Mr. BURROWS. In the other sections of the bill the language used is "military and naval service" in every instance. Is there objection to inserting the words "or naval" after "military."

Mr. MATSON. I have no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to insert those words.

Mr. HAMMOND. I object.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill embraces two important propositions, that embodied in the second section being much the more important.

The first section provides simply that the rule of evidence in claims filed by dependent parents shall be changed so that hereafter those who make such claims shall be required to prove only a present dependence, instead of a dependence existing at the time of the death of the soldier. This section of the bill is an exact copy of one section of a bill passed under a suspension of the rules, on motion of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WARNER), on the 21st day of April, 1884. That bill, in that form, passed the House and went to the Senate. It is in precise accord with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior, as contained in his last annual report, to be found on page 50 of that report.

The bill presented by the committee to-day differs from the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, to which I have just referred, only as to a proviso, and that proviso was placed in the bill on the suggestion made in the report of the Secretary of the Interior. It provides that pensions granted under the provisions of this act shall not begin until after the passage of the act, and hence shall not relate back.

It is supposed, and I may say estimated, that the provisions of the first section of the bill will add to the annual value of the pension-roll not more than $50,000; that there are not more than five hundred cases in the Pension Office covered by the provisions of this section, and if they were all allowed that the annual value of the pension-roll would not be increased by the section over the amount I have specified.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman from Indiana any statistics showing——

Mr. MATSON. With all due respect to the gentleman from Tennessee, I must decline to be interrupted now until I have completed my statement, after which I shall be glad to answer any inquiries.

As to the second proposition, the more important one, I desire to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to the fact that this provision embraces honorably discharged soldiers of all the wars in which the United States has been engaged; it embraces those engaged in the Seminole, in the Black Hawk, in the Mexican, and in the last war. It is a broad measure, and not confined to the soldiers of any particular war. The gist of the proposition, Mr. Speaker, is to take from the poor-houses of the country the soldiers who have honorably served their country during any war. The proposition contained in this section of the bill is simply that every man who is totally unable to labor, and is in a dependent condition, shall be pensioned at the rate of $12 per month. There is no provision for pensioning any one who has a less disability than a total inability to labor; and in addition to that he must show that he is dependent upon his daily labor for his support, and has no property from which to derive an income. It is a charity measure.

It will not be asserted by the friends or enemies of the bill, I apprehend, that there is anything in any contract made by the Government that would call for this legislation; but the legislation itself is the outgrowth of a sentiment that I believe prevails, throughout the length and breadth of this country, against permitting the men who have defended the Government to remain in the poor-houses to be supported by charity; and it is in obedience to that sentiment that the committee deem it proper to bring in a measure placing these men upon the honorable roll of pensioners of the United States.

Now as to the matter of cost: I desire to say that early in this Congress, in obedience to a suggestion made to the Commissioner of Pensions, when he was before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and was being examined in connection with various matters relating to the pension laws, he wrote to the authorities in every county in the United States for the purpose of ascertaining how many soldiers and sailors who had been in the United States service were then objects of public or private charity throughout the land. He learned from 1,240 of the 2,583 counties in the United States that in the 1,240 counties there are 5,172 cases of soldiers and sailors who are now being supported in the public institutions of charity. So that it is estimated, inasmuch as these reports came in about equal proportions from all sections of the country, that there are an equal number in the remaining counties, not quite one-half having been heard from, and so on that basis it is assumed that there are now in the United States a total of 10,344 persons dependent upon organized charities in the several States and Territories who would become pensioners under this bill.

The report affords no exact information as to the inmates of soldier's homes, both State and National, who may be entitled to the benefits of the bill, but we are clearly of opinion, from the best information attainable, that the number will not exceed 3,000.

The committee did not stop there. In addition to that there has been added an estimate as to those who are not supported by public charity, but who are the recipients of private relief—the recipients of charity from those who are not legally bound for their support—and there has been added, because of that class, an average of five to each county, giving a total of 12,905 in all. That added to the other number makes a total of 26,249 probable pensioners in the event of the passage of this bill. That is the estimate of the committee. Then, in addition to that, the committee considered the further fact that there were pending in the Pension Office claims of those who perhaps could bring themselves within the provisions of this bill, who were now receiving a small pension, and they added on that account a considerable number, 6,856 persons in all. So that the grand total of those who are to be benefited by the passage of this bill is estimated by the committee, from the best available sources, to be 33,105 persons at an annual expense of $144 each, or a total aggregate of $4,767,120 per annum.

This estimate, Mr. Speaker, which I have given to the House, is based upon the number of soldiers in the last war. Now, in addition to that, the other soldiers of other wars must be taken into account. It will be liberal, I think, to say that not more than 10 per cent. would be added to it, and even if 15 per cent. more would be added under this section, it would still require less than six millions of dollars per annum to pay the expenses of all the pensions provided for in the bill.

This, then, Mr. Speaker, is not only a broad and philanthropic measure, but it is a reasonable and conservative proposition. It is not wild, and is not extravagant. It is in the line of action suggested by the Chief Executive in his last annual message.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask the gentleman if the mode of estimating which he has just stated is approved by the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. MATSON. It is his own estimate.

Mr. BLOUNT. All the details are stated?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir. The figures and the facts and all these matters were gathered by the Commissioner of Pensions at the suggestion of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made early in this Congress.

I reserve the remainder of my time. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STORM). Five minutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before the gentleman from Indiana takes his seat will he permit me to ask him a question? I understand the gentleman to say that the applications now on file of the nature specified in the first section of the bill will be covered by a probable cost of $50,000. Has the gentleman any estimate which embraces the number of applications of that kind not on file?

Mr. MATSON. I have no communication from the Commissioner of Pensions directly on that subject, but I am told there will not be more than five hundred cases.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. Under this bill you seek to pension all of certain classes embraced in the second section. Will not the effect of that be to give to those in soldiers' homes, and not drawing a pension, not only the support they get in the soldiers' homes, but also the $12 a month provided here?

Mr. MATSON. I suppose, without some remedial legislation as to soldiers in the soldiers' homes it would have that effect.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And have you any information how many that might embrace?

Mr. MATSON. It is estimated it would embrace about three thousand.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman from Indiana if he has included the number already drawing pensions that would be pensioned under this bill?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir. I ask, reserving the remainder of my time, to have printed, as part of my remarks, an extract from this report which shows these figures.

There was no objection.

The extract from the committee's report is as follows:

In order that an approximation of the probable cost of the bill thus substituted could be presented to the consideration of Congress, the Commissioner of Pensions, at the suggestion of the committee, has communicated with the proper officers in every county in the several States and Territories of the Union to ascertain the number of ex-soldiers and ex-sailors now supported by public charity within their respective jurisdictions.

The result of this inquiry has been communicated to your committee, and we beg leave to submit for your consideration such facts and figures shown therein as we deem pertinent to the question at issue.

The Commissioner of Pensions reports that responses from 1,240 of the 2,581 counties in the entire United States have been received, showing that 5,172 ex-soldiers and ex-sailors are now supported in the public institutions of charity in said 1,240 counties. This number, however, does not include the soldiers and sailors who are now inmates of the Soldiers' Home and its several branches. It is safe to estimate that the 1,341 counties, pretty equally divided between the different sections of the country, who have not responded to the Commissioner's inquiries, have at least a number of ex-soldiers and ex-sailors receiving public charity equal to that found in the 1,240 counties who have furnished the desired information, thus making a total of 10,344 persons dependent upon organized charities of the several States and Territories who would become beneficiaries under the proposed bill.

The Commissioner's report affords no information as to the number of inmates of the soldiers' homes (National or State) who may be entitled to the benefits of this bill, but your committee are of the opinion that the same will not exceed 3,000.

There will also be found in the several counties of the United States persons entitled to the benefit of this proposed bill, not included within the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, because they are the recipients of private charity. How many of that class should enter into this calculation is necessarily a matter of conjecture, but we believe that an estimate of five to each county throughout the country, or a total of 12,905, will fully cover the number of possible applicants under the bill should it become a law. We have, then, 26,249 probable beneficiaries.

But we must still look in another direction.

As heretofore stated, there were, on June 30, 1885, 171,402 invalid pension claims pending at the Pension Office. How many of that number may cover "total disability" within the meaning of the proposed bill we are unable to state. But, taking the table of the Commissioner of Pensions, in his last annual report, as showing the different rates of pensions, and the number pensioned in each of the various rates on June 30, 1885, as a basis of calculation, it is safe to state that only one-tenth, or 17,140, of the then pending claims will, when allowed under any law, be awarded a rating for total disability, as contemplated under the bill. Sixty per cent. of the number of invalid applications being the average allowance under the present law, only 40 per cent. of the 17,140 cases likely to cover total disability, or 6,856, would have to be allowed under the operations of this proposed legislation, making a grand total of 33,105 persons to be provided for, at an annual expense of $144 each, or $4,767,120 for the whole number.

Mr. COWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] such time as he desires.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. While I may not vote against this bill, there are some features of it which I deem very objectionable, and I hope that at least in one particular an amendment will be allowed.

There is no subject, Mr. Speaker, upon which Congress is called to legislate where it is more important to adhere to sound and consistent principles than in legislating upon the subject of pensions; and yet there is no subject on which we are so likely to be carried away by sentiment, by emotion, and, if I may say so, by demagogy, as on the question of pensions.

The first section of this bill I heartily approve. I think it entirely sound in principle. There is every reason to suppose that a soldier who was killed in the war if he were living would extend aid now to his aged parents if in need. The question should not therefore be were they in need at the time of the soldiers' death, but are they in need now? This bill differs very widely in principle, too, from the bill passed at the last session of Congress which I voted against, and if I ever cast a righteous vote I think that was one; I allude to the bill increasing the pensions of that small class who were already receiving very large pensions. That bill to the few who had much gave more, and to those who had nothing it gave nothing.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How much? Eight dollars a month?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It increased their pensions already much larger than others received for equivalent disabilities.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The "much" was $8 a month.

Mr. MATSON. Six dollars.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That does not affect the proposition. The thing which strikes any one who examines our pension laws most forcibly is the inequality which he finds existing in them. Great injustice grows out of this inequality. In that particular this bill is an improvement. It extends alike to all wars and to all classes of soldiers.

But, Mr. Speaker, the principal objection which I have to this bill is to the pauper feature of the second section. Indeed, the bill is made by this section rather a pauper bill than a pension bill. I do not like that feature of it. In 1818 a bill was passed not unlike this relating to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war; it was a bill granting pensions to those who were indigent or paupers, but it did not stand long. It was modified the next year, I believe, so as to include all who had not property of the value of $300. It never gave satisfaction, and led to frequent amendments, and finally was repealed entirely. The principle of this act was frequently condemned in the debates in Congress. I will read a few extracts from a speech made on that law in 1832 by the distinguished member from Massachusetts, Mr. Choate. He referred to the bill in the first place as one making a distinction in favor of those who were indigent, and then went on to say:

It gives a pension to one who is indigent, because, perhaps, he has been vicious and idle, and denies it to his next-door neighbor, who served you as long and as well, but who is not so indigent, perhaps, because he has been moral and industrious.

As under the law of 1818, so under this bill, no matter how disabled a man may be—he may be unable to perform labor at all; yet, unless he is indigent, if he has any means at all that he has saved he is not entitled to a pension.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me one queston?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In a moment. The pension, therefore, is rather for the man's poverty—poverty coupled with inability to labor—than for disability incurred in the service.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me now?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Mr. Choate's objection to that legislation was because it granted a pension to a man who might be disabled by his own vicious habits or gross carelessness, whereas this bill expressly excludes that class from the benefit of its provisions.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But throughout the world one labors and saves, and consequently has in time of need, while another labors and spends all as he goes. Is it proposed to take from him that saves and give to him that spends?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But Mr. Choate's objection to that old bill is met in the bill now under consideration.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You have not read any others.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well, let me read some more. Mr. Choate goes on to say:

> Nobody willingly admits that he feels the pressure of the most respectful poverty. * * * It requires him to spread upon record conclusive evidence of his pauperism, under his own hand and oath.

That is what this bill does, too. And, Mr. Speaker, in departing from the sound principle that pensions are intended as compensation for disability incurred in the defense of the country, and not as charities or gratuities, we launch upon a sea to which no one can prescribe limits.

Under this bill if a man is able to do any work at all he gets nothing; or if able to do no work, he still has anything saved up, he gets nothing. Only where he can show that he is able to do no work and has nothing is he affected by this bill? The bill, therefore, offers the temptation to men receiving small pensions, but who work as they can to help along, to stop work in order to get the better offer to those who do not work at all of $12 a month.

I hope the bill at any rate will be amended before it becomes a law, so as to take out of it the purely pauper feature, and grant to all who apply under this bill a pension proportionate to his disability on the basis of the allowance proposed. The bill then would make present disability the starting point in preferring a claim, and thus cure the evil most complained of in the present law, and would be entirely sound in principle and safe and conservative in its application.

The bill should be amended, also, so as to except from its provisions those who are cared for at soldiers' homes while at the homes; and then I would like to wipe out entirely the provision relating to claim agents, and leave claimants to look for help to attorneys near home who can help them and get them out of the hands of agents about Washington, who can do them no good at all, but who fasten like leeches upon them.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know whether the gentleman from Ohio is favoring the passage of this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am criticising some features of the second section of the bill.

Mr. COWLES. Are you in favor of the bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I am pointing out some objections to it, and I shall ask that it be amended.

Mr. COWLES. I would rather yield time to some gentleman who is opposing the bill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that the bill can not be amended, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I shall ask unanimous consent. I shall ask that the bill be amended by inserting, in line 14, after the word "receive," the words: "a pension proportionate to such disability, on the basis of twelve dollars for," so as to make the provision read: "and be entitled to receive a pension proportionate to such disability, on the basis of twelve dollars for total inability to procure their subsistence by daily labor."

Mr. CURTIN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If it will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. CURTIN. Is not the object of your amendment covered by the existing law?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think not. Now, Mr. Speaker, as to the cost of this bill, the estimate of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is, in my opinion, entirely too low. We ought not to deceive ourselves or the country, but meet the question fairly. It probably will not take over five or six millions of dollars if we limit consideration to cases now on file in the Pension Office, but nobody can approximately estimate the number of applications that will come in under this bill if it becomes a law.

Mr. COWLES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how much time I have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I understood that there was half an hour given by consent.

Several MEMBERS. "No." "No."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I simply wish to add that a large number of those who are now drawing pensions under the present law for disability will undoubtedly surrender their pensions under the present law and apply under this act.

What the increase from this source will be can not be accurately estimated, but altogether instead of five or six millions, after there has been time for claims to come in that, no doubt, will come in, I think the amount required to satisfy them will hardly fall short of twelve to fifteen millions annually, and may rise to twenty millions, or more. In this connection I would like to add, for the information of the House, a few figures, showing the cost of the late war, so that we may know what we are doing. The first cost of the war was about $3,350,000,000. This has been paid, and with it in interest and pensions about $3,300,000,000 more, and before it is all over at least $3,300,000,000 more must be paid. Thus the first cost of $3,350,000,000, before all is done, will have been paid three times over, and the war will have cost not less than $10,000,000,000.

Mr. COWLES. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no idea, Mr. Speaker, that anything I may say is likely to influence any gentleman on this floor in his action on this bill; yet I do think there is reason for us to pause before we pass a bill of this kind and ask what will be its result when it shall come into practical operation. The gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. MATSON] came before the House in effusive style and declared that the purpose of it was to take soldiers from the poor-houses of the country. He could not have used any language better calculated to bring out the sympathies of the House for the measure. But he did not stop there.

After making an estimate of the number that were in the poor-houses of the country on information which evidently was exceedingly meager, he then undertook to make an estimate of persons not in the poor-houses but dependent upon the contributions of friends. When he reached that point he was very careful to avoid, or rather he did avoid, any statement of details by which any human being could make an estimate. I asked him how he reached the result. His answer was by estimate; but there is not one single scintilla of evidence before this House upon which gentlemen can reach any conclusion as to the number of persons to be included in this way. I asked the gentleman if the Commissioner of Pensions approved of his mode of reaching the conclusion. He stated that he did, but, feeling that that official could not come to this House and ask appropriations from the Treasury of the United States upon so indefinable a ground, I pressed the gentleman, and then he said to me that the Commissioner had not made that estimate.

Mr. MATSON, The gentleman will allow me, I suppose, to say——

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not the time.

Mr. MATSON. It is simply a misunderstanding.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, Mr. Speaker, let it be a misunderstanding.

Now, we understand the fact that the Commissioner of Pensions has made no such estimate; and while the Committee on Invalid Pensions have been in session here for months and months they have failed to obtain from the Commissioner or from any other source any information upon which this body can intelligently vote, for these appropriations may run into millions upon millions. The gentleman comes here with an estimate that is simply absurd so far as the ascertainment of the truth from it is concerned.

And I am reminded that when the arrearage-of-pensions act was passed a distinguished gentleman from Ohio came upon the floor, as my friend from Indiana does to-day, as the advocate of the soldier and estimated that the act would involve a cost of about fifteen millions. Instead of reaching merely that sum it has amounted to about three hundred millions. In behalf of the people who pay the taxes of this country I insist, as a representative, that before we pass this legislation we shall know what burdens it is to bring to the tax-payers.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he does not think the estimates in this case are about as good as the estimates in regard to the Mexican pension bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I decline to yield, for the gentleman knows there is but little time.

Sir, we do not know, we can not know, what the cost of this measure is to be. We can not know how it is to affect the matter of taxation in the future. We ought to know what we are doing. The measure ought not to be hurried through in any clap-trap style and in utter disregard of the ordinary methods by which we reach conclusions for legislative purposes.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I would like to know whether the gentleman himself has made any estimate.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New York asks whether I have made an estimate. I tell him frankly I have not. More than that, it appears that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have themselves made no estimate; for as soon as they get away from the meager facts in relation to persons in almshouses, instead of giving the data upon which they base their conclusions, they simply declare, "We have made an estimate." When I asked how they got at the result, the reply was, "We estimated it." When asked, "Did the Commissioner of Pension agree to it?" the answer was, "Yes;" but subsequently that answer was corrected. And under these circumstances we are called upon to pass this bill!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has now five minutes.

Mr. MATSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. MORRILL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I have but a single word to say on this measure, and it is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the membership of this House owe to the soldiers of this country an apology for introducing and attempting to pass such a bill as this. This apology is made appropriate by the fact that the majority of the membership of that committee representing the party in the majority in this House have compelled us to present a measure of this character or else present none. With this apology I have simply to say that the soldiers of this country must wait for just pension legislation until the control of this House passes into the hands of their friends. I shall vote for the bill.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, under the law as it now stands the aged father or mother who gave a son to the country on the battlefield is obliged to prove dependence upon the soldier for support at the time of the death of the son or can receive no pension. This bill proposes to change the law in that respect, and provides that the father or mother who is now dependent upon the charity of others for support shall receive a pension for the loss of a son in the service. This is a principle which has been recognized by Congress during the last six years in the passage of individual pension bills. In our special legislation on this subject we have asked only the question whether the old father or the old mother is now dependent. We have left out of consideration entirely the question of dependence at the time of the death of the soldier.

The second section of this bill provides that all soldiers who are now dependent upon charity, who are unable to earn a livelihood by manual labor, shall receive a pension. This is a declaration on the part of the Government that no old soldier who followed the flag for three months, who offered his life in defense of the country, shall ever end his days in the poor-house.

Mr. STEELE. And it includes a few who followed the other flag.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Indiana says it "includes a few who followed the other flag."

A MEMBER. Not only a few.

Mr. MORRILL. It is true that the soldier of the Mexican war or of an Indian war who fought three months for his country and who afterward——

Mr. BOUTELLE. May have fought four years against it.

Mr. MORRILL. Who afterward entered the confederate service shall, if disabled now and if he did not receive that disability in the confederate service, be pensioned. Mr. Speaker, for one I am willing to yield that point. If the soldier fought three months in the Mexican war or in an Indian war, bravely and nobly, I am willing to forgive him if afterward he was led into the service against the country. All legislation is to a certain extent a compromise, and I gladly accept this for the sake of my old comrades who are now poor and dependent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is now entitled to two minutes.

Mr. MATSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, this bill seems to me very fair and conservative. It is estimated by the committee that it will add $6,000,000 a year to the present expenditures for pensions. It has been stated that we cannot ascertain the amount of the demand which this bill will make upon the Treasury. We cannot do so accurately, but we can approximate to the fact. I believe that the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, representing the committee, is approximately correct—is at least a safe estimate upon which to base our legislation. If this bill be passed, it will furnish a greater amount of relief in proportion to the sum involved than any measure in the interest of pensioners that Congress has heretofore enacted. I hope it will pass without a dissenting voice.

Mr. MATSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there are, perhaps, objections to some features of this bill on the part of some gentlemen, but I wish to say that this bill is wholly unsectional. It lays its kindly hand on every part of this nation, North and South. It touches with kindness the sufferers in every State in this Union who supported the country's flag. It is said, by some around me, "it will pension some who have been in the Confederate service." Ay, that is true, but the bill prohibits him from a pension if his disability was incurred in that service. If, however, he was in the service of the country and there incurred disability but afterward was in the Confederate service, I shall vote for his being pensioned for the disability honorably incurred in his country's service, and I have no apology to make here before doing it.

This is not a proposition of charity, for although we had no written contract with these men we gave a pledge that they and their fathers and mothers should not live or die in the poor-houses. That is the pledge given by this nation, and this bill seeks in a humble manner to fulfill that pledge. This bill gives but a little, but let us give that little in obedience to the very kindest and best dictates of our natures.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] whether this bill would pension any soldier but one totally disabled?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I so understand it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let that be understood, that only those who are totally disabled are the ones who are to receive the benefit under this bill, and they form but a small part of the whole mass of the disabled soldiers.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It is but a small amount, a few millions annually, but where we can not get an ell for our deserving ones let us get an inch.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired, and gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the second section an amendment, "Provided further, That pensions under this act shall not be paid to any person who is being supported in a national soldiers' home."

Mr. BLOUNT and Mr. HAMMOND objected.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask consent to offer the amendment I suggested.

Mr. HAMMOND and Mr. BLOUNT objected.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think it is perfectly evident no consent will be given, and therefore I demand the regular order of business. Let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. COWLES and Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 180, nays 76, not voting 63; as follows:

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. TARSNEY, on this bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. JACKSON, is absent on account of sickness. He is paired with Mr. BARRY, of Mississippi. If present, Mr. JACKSON would vote "aye."

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. HEARD, for this day, on account of sickness.

MEXICAN PENSION BILL.

The committee on pensions was called.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope my friend will modify his motion so as to move a non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on this bill. There are provisions here that ought to be amended. One requires an applicant to swear to his poverty or prove it in order to get any pension at all. I shall vote for the bill if I can not get a better one; but I hope that if a conference is had we will get some of the objectionable features of this Senate bill stricken off and get others incorporated that are more just to the Mexican veterans. I submit to the gentleman that if a conference is had the report is privileged and a majority vote will pass it. It can not, therefore, possibly endanger the bill to agree to conference. We have all to make and nothing to lose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I make this motion by direction of the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "directed to," in the fourth line, and insert:

"Place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served sixty days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, and the surviving widow, of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become sixty-two years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, and payable only from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto, or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month.

"SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension-roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was put upon such roll through false and fraudulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other record evidence of enlistment and service and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant, under any act of Congress, for and on account of service in the said war with Mexico, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

"SEC. 4. That the pension laws now in force which are not inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby made a part of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

"SEC. 5. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

"SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the House bill demanded?

The reading of the House bill was not called for.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand a second on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE].

Mr. OATES. Before the vote is taken I desire to ask a question with reference to the meaning of a provision in this bill, the answer to which will have an influence upon further action with reference to it, for if it is subject to one construction to which its language appears susceptible it seems to me manifest that it ought to go to a committee of conference.

In the thirtieth line of the first section of the bill as proposed to be amended I would like to inquire the effect of the word "or" where it is inserted. I will read, beginning with line 28, so as to show the connection:

But it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined,—

That is clear enough that the disability, if received, would entitle the applicant to be admitted to the pension-roll before arriving within the limit of age prescribed, but it goes on further to provide:—

or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Would that exclude absolutely all such persons?

Mr. ELDREDGE. No, sir; that permits them to draw pensions if they are sixty-two years of age.

Mr. OATES. It is very awkwardly expressed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That may be, but the effect of the law will be the same.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 171, noes 0.

So the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate—fifteen minutes in support of, and fifteen minutes in opposition to the motion. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE] to control the time in support, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in opposition to the motion.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, if no gentleman desires to speak against the bill, I am perfectly willing that it should come to a vote now, without discussion. [Cries of "Vote!"]

I ask the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. BRAGG. I called for a second upon this motion because I am opposed to the limit of time fixed which shall be deemed service sufficient to enable a person to make application and receive pension. I do not believe in sixty days' soldiers who never see a battle being pensioned at the hands of the Government any more than I believe in the bill which has just passed this House; and to say a few words upon that bill was one of the reasons for demanding a second upon this motion.

That such a bill as that ought to pass, making four months on the muster-roll sufficient to entitle a man to make an application for a pension, is to my mind utterly inadmissable. I shall vote against this bill, as I voted against the other, because I believe that that bill ought to have been entitled "A bill to pension the rubbish of the Army of the United States, and to revive the business of claim agents in the city of Washington." [Laughter.] By its terms four months on the muster-roll is all that is required——

Mr. OATES. Three months.

Mr. BRAGG. Three months; worse and worse. That covers every substitute, every bounty-jumper, every scalawag who went into the Army in January and February, 1865. That covers every man who enlisted in 1861, and before active hostilities were commenced in the field it was discovered that he was physically defective or else constitutionally defective in the essentials necessary to a soldier, and we permitted him to slide out. That is the reason I voted against that bill and made this call for the purpose of submitting this statement upon my vote in order that my action should not be misunderstood. And, permit me to say that, although my term of official life is short and may never be again renewed, yet I hope that so long as I live, if it ever come to pass that I shall vote upon a pension bill, I never will forget the brave men who followed my flag in the battle-field for four long years and classify them with the rubbish of the Army in order to get them a pension. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. ELDREDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 5, not voting 66; as follows:

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I beg to state that I refrained from voting because paired with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MORGAN]. If he had been present I should have voted "aye."

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. SWINBURNE, until further notice.

Mr. PINDAR with Mr. KELLEY, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

SUPPLEMENT TO BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am authorized by the Committee on Claims to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2643) as amended, which I send to the desk.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 105, noes 54.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays. But before that I ask to have the question stated by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois sent the bill to the desk, and stated what his motion was.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I have a right to have my motion stated.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is in order at any time.

Mr. SPRINGER. But not before the other motion is made, when I am on the floor to make it. I am on the floor, and I cannot be taken off the floor when I have made a proper and parliamentary motion till my motion is stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can state it. The gentleman has stated it. But the first question is on the motion to adjourn, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] calls for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 25.

Mr. WILKINS. Count the other side.

The negative side was counted, and numbered 117.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; thirty-six members voting therefor.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SOWDEN and Mr. SPRINGER.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 86.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 103, not voting 119; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of names of members voting.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. HIRES for the remainder of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill indicated by him.

The bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Claims of the House was then read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to investigate and make a finding of fact in any claim or demand, other than war claims, against the United States, pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, upon the same being referred to the court under this act: Provided, That all claims and demands not presented to said court by the claimant or claimants within the period of two years after such claims and demands have been referred to the court under this act shall be forever barred.

SEC. 2. That the court is required to promptly consider all claims and demands referred under this act and presented to the court, under such needful rules and regulations as it may adopt, and subject to the provisions of existing laws not inconsistent with this act. That on the first day of every December session of Congress the clerk of the Court of Claims shall transmit to each House of Congress a full and complete statement of the findings of fact in each claim or demand investigated under this act and not theretofore reported, stating what amount, if anything, is due the claimant or claimants; whether the claim or demand is founded upon any act of Congress, or upon any contract, express or implied; the laches or diligence of the claimant or claimants in presenting the claim or demand against the United States; and such other findings of fact and conclusions of law as the court shall deem material to enable Congress to pass upon such claim or demand. That until such claim or demand is finally investigated and reported upon to Congress by the court, as herein provided, neither House of Congress shall consider the same, by bill or otherwise, in reference to allowing any such claim or demand.

SEC. 3. That whenever any private or domestic claim or demand, other than war claims, against the United States, is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims, and the same shall there be proceeded with as herein provided. When claims and demands are referred to the court under this act, by any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, such committee shall, before the end of the session of Congress at which such reference was made, report the fact in writing to the House of Congress by which such committee was appointed. That nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claim or demand, and that no judgment shall be entered thereon by the court.

SEC. 4. That at the adjournment of each Congress all bills relating to private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States, which may be pending in either House of Congress or before any committee of either House, shall, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, respectively, be referred to the Court of Claims, together with all papers relating thereto, as hereinbefore provided; and all such claims and demands shall be investigated by the court as provided in this act. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House shall enter in the Journals of the respective Houses, and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a statement showing what bills have been so transferred.

SEC. 5. That after the passage of this act neither House of Congress shall consider or entertain, for any purpose other than that of referring the same to some judicial tribunal or commission under existing law, any private or domestic claim or demand against the United States which involves the investigation of facts other than war claims, until such facts shall have been investigated by such judicial tribunal or commission and the findings of fact reported to Congress.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General, or his assistants, under his direction, to appear for the defense and protection of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act.

SEC. 7. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand a second.

Mr. SPRINGER. I trust that a second will be considered as ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BRAGG, and there were—ayes 54, noes 80.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, only fifteen members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BRAGG. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused; only ten members voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. Upon the motion to adjourn there are yeas 53 and nays 80. So the House refuses to adjourn. The tellers will take their places upon the question of ordering a second.

Mr. SPRINGER (before the count was completed). Mr. Speaker, it is evident that it will take some time to get a quorum, and if it can be understood that a second is ordered I will myself move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no quorum I believe.

The SPEAKER. There is not. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to adjourn, there being no decision?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the vote. Upon this question the yeas are 87 and the nays none. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. The question of ordering a second will be the first question to be determined when the bill comes up on the next day for the suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. It will.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 10242) making an appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 18, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate for an appropriation of $5,000 for the employment of physicians and the purchase of medicines in cases of Indians who have no treaty or gratuity funds to their credit; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 11, 1887, an estimate of the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Department of Justice; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in reply to a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON], certain information in reference to the expense of additional terms of court in Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter from the clerk of the United States courts for the district of Indiana in regard to fees of such clerk; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SARAH E. NORTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton, which was, in line 7, after the words "rate of," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah E. Norton, a volunteer nurse during the war of the rebellion, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was concurred in.

WILLIAM ERVIN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a petition of a committee appointed by the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States, respecting the passage of a bill looking to the extinguishment of pleuro-pneumonia. As it is very short and relates to an important subject I ask that the petition may be inserted in the RECORD.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IOWA CITY, IOWA, January 12, 1887.

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives from the State of Iowa, Washington, D. C.:

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned, a committee appointed by the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States, in behalf of the legal voters of our State of all political parties, our brother farmers and stock-raisers, dependent in a large measure for their support upon the proceeds of cattle raised and fed on their farms, represent that they are at this time suffering great pecuniary loss from the fact that the dread cattle disease—contagious pleuro-pneumonia—has established a foothold in an adjoining State. Should this disease find its way into our herds of cattle we would suffer irreparable loss. That it will do so, unless the most heroic measures are at once resorted to, can not be questioned. The people of this great cattle-growing State of Iowa hereby appeal to you as their representatives to use every possible influence in your power to secure the passage of the bill recently introduced in both the Senate and House of Representatives for the extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia and known as the "Miller bill."

Never before have a like number of your constituents been so vitally interested in a measure to be brought before the Congress of the United States.

THOMAS B. WALES, SR.
WM. LARREBEE.
H. C. WHEELER.
C. C. NOURSE.
JOHN SCOTT.
C. C. CARPENTER.
ROBERT MILLER.
J. J. RICHARDSON.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for a reduction of internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAWYER presented a memorial of vessel-owners and persons interested in the carrying trade of the northern chain of lakes, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 6104) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Sainte Marie River, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a letter which was intended, doubtless, as a petition from citizens of Carroll County, Missouri, in regard to pleuro-pneumonia, praying for the passage of what is known as the Miller bill. It is signed by Samuel B. Robertson, J. I. Mansur, and many other leading citizens of Carroll County, Missouri. I ask that it may be received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I believe that committee is considering the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of the Meyer Brothers Drug Company of Kansas City, Mo., praying for a repeal of the laws establishing internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Carroll County, Missouri, praying for the passage of the pleuro-pneumonia bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PLUMB. I have a letter from a leading attorney in my State in regard to a very important subject which I desire to call to the attention of the Judiciary Committee. I wish to have the formality of a reference by the Senate of the paper to that committee as though it were a petition. It is not in form a petition, but it is in substance one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper, being in the nature of a petition, will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary if there be no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have a communication from the Saint Paul Chamber of Commerce which is defective in form, perhaps, to authorize it to be presented to the Senate, but it is in regard to legislation pending before the Senate, and it is evidently of a character that should go to one of the committees of the Senate. I therefore ask leave to present this memorial in favor of a national bankrupt law, and I ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be received and so referred if there be no objection.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented resolutions adopted by the Saint Paul (Minnesota) Chamber of Commerce, favoring certain amendments of the customs laws; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petition of Mrs. Maria M. Brooks, of Peoria, Ill., praying that her name may be placed upon the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Nebraska, praying for the passage of the Blair educational bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of citizens of Marion, Ala., praying that an appropriation be made in aid of the Colored People's World's Exposition; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented petitions of 27 citizens of New York city and 68 citizens of Chicago, Ill., praying for such legislation as will prevent the violation of the Sabbath by interstate railroading and Sunday parades of United States troops; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred the following petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of workingmen of the District of Columbia, praying an appropriation to pay John Pope Hodnett for services rendered to them as counsel for the last fifteen years; and

A petition of merchants of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of the Senate bill providing for the payment of John Pope Hodnett for services rendered as counsel for workingmen of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2542) to pay John Pope Hodnett for services rendered as counsel to the Government in the investigation into affairs of the District of Columbia, acting as such counsel by order of a resolution of the House of Representatives; also for acting as counsel for the workingmen of the District of Columbia for fifteen years last past, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2629) granting a pension to Jane Brown Dunn, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1321) granting arrears of pension to Richard H. McWhorter, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3108) granting a pension to James Lucas;

A bill (S. 2670) granting an increase of pension to James H. Thomas;

A bill (H. R. 7748) granting a pension to John H. Stucker; and

A bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Clara M. Tannehill.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2102) granting a pension to Amos Baccus, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3114) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7716) granting a pension to Lizzie Brown, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2284) granting a pension to James Moss, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3642) for the relief of the heirs of Jacob Cramer, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7390) granting a pension to David B. Caldwell; and

A bill (S. 3131) granting a pension to Hugh Rogers.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2921) to authorize the Frémont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad Company to build its road across the Fort Meade Military Reservation, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Rachel A. Gould, praying that the sum allowed as pension for the eldest minor child of her deceased husband be continued, notwithstanding the fact that he is beyond the age of sixteen, submitted an adverse report thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah A. Kelly, of Pennsylvania, praying to be allowed a pension on account of the services rendered by her deceased husband in the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1588) granting a pension to John C. Adams, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2173) for the relief of George W. Cousins, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 323) to remove the charge of desertion against David Wood. The committee find that since the introduction of this bill the War Department, upon a re-examination of the case, have removed the charge of desertion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, there being no necessity for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the same thing.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 375) to refer the claims of the Eastern and Western bands of the Cherokee Indians to the Court of Claims, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 3161) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and enter final judgment upon the claims of the Eastern and Western Cherokee Indians; which was read twice by its title.

CONSTITUTIONAL CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America to report a concurrent resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to as follows:

That a joint committee of five members of the Senate and eight members of the House of Representatives be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of holding in 1892, in commemoration of the discovery of America, an international exhibition of the industries and products of all nations; and if such an exhibition shall be deemed expedient, to consider the time, place, circumstances, and general plan thereof, and to report by bill or otherwise.

DATE OF MILITARY COMMISSIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1171) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate, recommending the passage of the bill without amendment, and the committee have further instructed me to ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to amend section 1 of the act of June 3, 1884, so as to read as follows:

That the joint resolution approved July 11, 1870, entitled "Joint resolution amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866," is hereby so amended and shall be so construed that in all cases arising under the same any person who was duly appointed and commissioned, whether his commission was actually received by him or not, shall be considered as commissioned to the grade therein named from the date from which he was to take rank under and by the terms of his said commission, and shall be entitled to all pay and emoluments as if actually mustered at that date: Provided, That at the date from which he was to take rank by the terms of his commission there was a vacancy to which he could be so commissioned, and that he was actually performing the duties of the grade to which he was so commissioned, or, if not so performing such duties, then from such time after the date of his commission as he may have actually entered upon such duties: And provided further, That any person held as a prisoner of war, or who may have been absent by reason of wounds, or in hospital by reason of disability received in the service in the line of duty, at the date of his commission, if a vacancy existed for him in the grade to which so commissioned, shall be entitled to the same pay and emoluments as if actually performing the duties of the grade to which he was commissioned and actually mustered at such date: And provided further, That this act and the resolution hereby amended shall be construed to apply only in those cases where the commission bears date prior to June 20, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number required by existing laws and regulations: And provided further, That the pay and allowances actually received shall be deducted from the sums to be paid under this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 3162) for the relief of James Farley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3163) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Williams; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3164) granting a pension to Eugene B. Payne; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3165) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (S. 3166) granting increase of pension to Eleanor B. Goodfellow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3167) to amend an act of Congress, approved July 29, 1876, in regard to leave of absence of Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 3168) to extend Executive avenue in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of Henry A. Paus;

A bill (H. R. 9868) for the relief of O. F. Adams; and

A bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 230) for the erection of a public building at Worcester, Mass.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. McMILLAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas it appears from documents laid before the Senate that the ancient rights of the United States fishermen, when bound to the northeast deep sea fisheries, of transit through Canadian waters, with the incidents appertaining thereto, of shelter, repair, and provisioning in the adjacent ports, such rights being founded on international law and on treaty, have been obstructed by Canadian authorities, such obstruction being attended by indignity and annoyance and followed by great loss to the parties interested in such fishing vessels; and,

Whereas such transit, with its incidents of temporary shelter, repair, and provisioning, is part of a system with the transit with similar incidents permitted to Canadian engines, cars, vessels, and goods through the territory and territorial waters of the United States on their way from point to point in Canada, with this distinction, that the transit in the former case is a matter of right, based on international law and treaty, while in the latter case it is a matter of permission and gratuity:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is authorized whenever it shall appear to him that there is an insistence on the part of the Canadian authorities with the obstructions, indignities, and annoyances above recited, to issue his proclamation prohibiting the transit through the United States or the territorial waters thereof from point to point in Canada or from Canada to the ocean, of any engines, cars, goods, or vessels proceeding from Canada.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the resolution may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed under the general rule.

Mr. DAWES. In connection with that reference I should like to inquire, if it is not considered out of the way by the Committee on Foreign Relations, if they have considered the bill which was introduced at the last session by me covering the same point, and are ready to make some report upon it at as early a day as the exigencies of this case now seem to demand. In the latter part of the last session I introduced a bill, the object of which was to cover precisely this point. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I was in hopes to have heard from that committee upon it before this time. If some one of the committee could make some explanation of the delay, which I have no doubt they have good reason for, I should be very much obliged.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Foreign Relations was instructed to investigate by a subcommittee the whole question and all the matters which are now in conflict between us and Canada. They did investigate during the vacation. The evidence has now been printed, and that subcommittee has this very morning been in session considering the evidence and the report, and what may be necessary to be done. Undoubtedly that report will be made to the Senate within a very few days.

The resolution just introduced, I will say to the Senator from Maryland, ought to be a joint resolution to be of any effect.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to intimate that the committee was negligent, but of course the committee are aware of what is transpiring, and every day the grievances are growing more glaring and more inexcusable. If anything could hasten action on the part of that committee, it would be the very conduct of the British government which calls for the legislation itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be printed before its reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print has been made.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be printed before its reference. I could only hear indistinctly the resolution, and I do not know what ought to be done with it. I ask that it may be printed and lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. FRYE. It should be amended by making it a joint resolution. It is a Senate resolution, which would be of no force at all in authorizing the President of the United States to do anything.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the resolution goes over until to-morrow without any change.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to take from the table the resolution offered by me directing the Interior Department to take some action to enjoin the sales of public lands of the United States in the State of Florida within the limits of the grant to the State made the 17th of May, 1856, for the construction of railroads in that State. At the hour when the order of resolutions shall be called for, I shall ask the Senate to take that resolution up for consideration.

MAIL MESSENGERS.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] is a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8346) authorizing the employment of mail messengers in the postal service. The Senator from Texas is absent, and may be for some days. The House conferees are here, and I ask the Chair to consider it as a vacancy on the conference committee, and fill it at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy on the conference committee stated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is really not a vacancy, but it is a mere matter of form, and I suggest that the Chair be authorized to substitute a conferee in the place of the Senator from Texas, who is absent.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; that will be the proper course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will consider that to be the consent of the Senate, and name the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] in place of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1333) for the relief of William H. Randle;

An act (S. 1353) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication the claims of John H. Kinkead, Samuel Sussman, and Charles O. Wood;

An act (S. 1829) for the relief of the Greensburg Limestone Company and others; and

An act (S. 2901) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey the United States custom-house and post-office property at Eastport, in the State of Maine, lately destroyed by fire, the proceeds thereof to be invested in the purchase of a new site for, and to provide for the erection of, a new public building at that place.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the morning hour is closed, and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. EUSTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII or Rule IX?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a special order.

Mr. EUSTIS. The bill has been made a special order several times.

Mr. MORGAN. If the bill is a special order, it comes up at 2 o'clock, under the rule, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. Whenever reached?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. MORGAN. Not before 2 o'clock, anyway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a special order.

Mr. EUSTIS. My motion is in order. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough to have the title of the bill read?

The Chief Clerk read the bill by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks inform the Chair that the bill has already been read at length. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Has the bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read. Does the Senator desire to have it read again?

Mr. PLATT. I think it had better be read, unless we can have something equivalent to its reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I see that some portion of the lands originally granted are forfeited and some are confirmed. I wish the Senator from Louisiana would make a short explanation of the bill showing why the lands forfeited are forfeited and why those confirmed are confirmed.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. If the Senator from Louisiana will allow me a moment before he proceeds, I should like to know also in the explanation that is about to be made whether any lands are included in this declaration of forfeiture which are adjacent to roads completed at this time. In the second place, I should like to know whether any lands included in the grant, a part of which is to be forfeited by the bill, are omitted from the declaration of the forfeiture, which lie adjacent to that portion of the road not completed within the time specified in the act for the completion of the whole road.

Mr. EUSTIS. In answer to the question of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] I will state that the portion of the road to which the land is adjacent which is forfeited was not built by either the grantee or by the assignee of the grantee. It was a portion of a road built by another company, which was purchased. Therefore, the construction of that portion of the road was not predicated upon any grant which was made by Congress.

Although this is called a forfeiture in the bill, it is really not a forfeiture, because this railroad company has filed a relinquishment of any claim with reference to any of the lands which are adjacent to about 82 miles of the road.

In answer to the question of the Senator from Oregon, I will state that this grant was made in 1871 to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, upon the condition that the road designated in the grant should be constructed and completed within five years. The time would have expired in 1876. There was nothing whatsoever done by the railroad company, which was known as the Backbone Railroad Company, during those five years, nor by that railroad company after the expiration of those five years; but in 1881, which was five years after the time had expired during which the grant existed, the Backbone Railroad Company made an assignment of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, and the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company completed the road, and this is an act which is to confirm title in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. The Senator understands that.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I understand, then, one purpose of this act is not to forfeit land adjacent to uncompleted road, but to confirm a grant adjacent to completed road, which road was completed after the time fixed for the completion of the road.

Mr. EUSTIS. By another company.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. By another company. That is about the situation.

Mr. EUSTIS. Now, Mr. President, I do not intend to speak on this question. I had occasion formerly to address the Senate with regard to it, and I then took the ground that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company was not entitled to this grant. At that time the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company claimed this grant by virtue of an assignment from the Backbone Railroad Company. That was the whole basis of its title. I opposed that view. I argued that that assignment was illegal and void—that the Backbone Railroad Company acquired no title to that land, and therefore had no assignable interest in that land. The theory of this bill, I may say, confirms that view. Instead of Congress recognizing the title to exist in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company by reason and by virtue of the assignment, instead of Congress recognizing the legality and the validity of the assignment as the basis of the title, this act proposes to ignore that assignment and directly to confirm a title in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Then the object of this bill is to make a new grant, or rather confirm a grant, to a company that in the judgment of the Senator never was entitled to a grant at all. Is that it?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir. And, therefore, Mr. President, holding the views which I entertained at first—that the original grantee never acquired from the Government of the United States any interest in the land, by failing to comply with any of the conditions of the grant—I am opposed to making a new grant at this date to the New Orleans Railroad Company because that railroad company has completed this road.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Now, let there be no misunderstanding between us. I wish to understand this bill in connection with some other bills that are pending and that we have already had up. If it should turn out that the Senator is wrong in his opinion as to the power of the one company to make an assignment to the other company that would be good, then the case would stand thus: that this is a proposition in that event to declare forfeited certain lands adjacent to completed road at this date. If the assignment was good, then the proposition is to declare forfeited lands adjacent to completed road by a company that had the power and right to complete it.

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not base my vote upon any assumption whatever that the assignment was legal at all.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I understand that. I understand the Senator from Louisiana holds to the view that the grantee company had no power under the law to make an assignment at all.

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. And, therefore, this bill in that view of the case would be to confirm title in a company that never had any right to it at all. But what I wish to get at is this: If the Senator should happen to be wrong in his view of the law and his view as to the right of this grantee company to make the assignment, then it would simply be a proposition to declare forfeited land adjacent to completed road that had been completed by a company authorized to complete it before the declaration of forfeiture.

Mr. EUSTIS. Of course that is the object of this act. This act proposes to confirm the title in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. That is equivalent to a new grant, in my judgment. That is to say, the theory of this bill is that the original grantee, the Backbone Railroad Company, did not acquire any title whatever to these lands, but Congress in consideration of the fact that the railroad has been completed by another company, under this bill proposes to transfer that grant from the original grantee to the assignee, the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

I shall propose several amendments to this bill. The first amendment that I propose is to declare a forfeiture of the whole grant. If the Senate should vote that down, I shall then propose some amendments to protect the rights of the settlers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What section is that in?

Mr. EUSTIS. I offer an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and the lands covered thereby shall be considered and treated in all respects the same as if said grant had never been made: Provided, That any title to said lands acquired by purchase from any railroad company by any bona fide settler is hereby confirmed to said purchaser.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. EUSTIS. I will state that the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, at the time when they were trying to get this grant by direct act of Congress, telegraphed that they could build this road without this grant; and in my opinion, to confirm this grant is simply an act of donation to a company, between which and the Government of the United States there never has been any privity whatsoever.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the question of the right of the Backbone Railroad Company and of the present owners of this property has been fully discussed in the Senate, as well as in another body. There probably is no case where a railroad company has claimed and obtained patents to land that has had so thorough and complete an examination of all the features involved as this particular case. Senators will remember that at the very beginning of this Congress, on a resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], there was a very thorough and general discussion of this question. It had been a matter of discussion in the other branch of Congress, and it had been a matter of discussion before the Department of the Interior for five or six years.

In 1881 a company then claiming to be entitled to the land grant named in this bill transferred to the present corporation its claim to that grant. The present corporation proceeded first to purchase 68 miles of road in the general direction of the grant and then to complete the road. Early in 1881, as I will show by the record, while Mr. Kirkwood was Secretary of the Interior, the assignee filed the transfer of this claim from the original company, and thereupon the Department asserted to this company that it had a valid, legal transfer—a transfer that would be recognized by the Department thereafter in dealing with that corporation.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in reply to a question put to him by letter by the president of the so-called Backbone Railroad Company, Mr. Barnum, then declared that all had been done that was necessary and proper to be done to lodge and vest in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company the right to complete this road and receive the land therefor. That was before the company had done any part of the work that was to be done.

I will call the attention of the Senate, although I have already done that on a former occasion, to some of these documents. I do not intend, myself, to go fully into this discussion. The matter has been so thoroughly discussed before the Senate and has been a matter of so much examination that it does not seem to be necessary to do so.

In 1883 a Mr. Steever, who was an attorney-at-law and represented this corporation, addressed the then Secretary of the Interior on this subject, and here is the first letter of that Secretary on the subject, being the first dealing he had with it officially:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 24, 1883.

SIR: I have yours concerning the mortgage of New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company. The Interior Department has nothing to do with that matter.

That was a question whether they were allowed to mortgage their road.

My predecessor submitted the question, as to the right of the company to receive the lands from the Government, to the Attorney-General, who decided the question in favor of the company. The Interior Department was compelled to accept this as the law governing the case, and then it became the duty of the Department to carry out the law. I do not understand the Department has anything to do with the question of what disposition the company shall make of the lands.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER,
Secretary.

Mr. WEST STEEVER,
Attorney-at-Law, Washington, D. C.

The basis upon which the Interior Department then acted can be seen from a brief statement. In December, 1880, this transfer was made. It was filed in the Interior Department early in January, 1881. The first letter that I find from the Department on this subject is the following:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1881.

SIR: In compliance with the verbal request of Hon. J. H. Ketcham, I make the following statement:

This is a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

By the twenty-second section of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company," &c., approved March 3, 1871, a grant of land was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of its road.

At a special meeting of the directors of said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, held December 29, 1880, a resolution was adopted authorizing the president and secretary of the company to transfer all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans

Pacific Railway Company, and to make and execute such instruments as should be necessary for that purpose.

On the 5th day of January, 1881, the president and secretary, pursuant to said authority, executed a deed in the name of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company, conveying all the right, title, and interest of said company in and to said grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

On the 3d day of February, 1881, the directors of the last-named company adopted a resolution authorizing the president of the company to accept said conveyance, and to execute any documents necessary to evidence the acceptance.

There can be no doubt that when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts said transfer the company will be fully vested with all the right, title, and interest which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company has in and to said grant.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner.

W. H. BARNUM, Esq.,
President New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

To this letter, on February 19, Mr. Barnum transmitted the following:

NEW YORK, February 19, 1881.

SIR: I transmit herewith telegram from E. B. Wheelock, president, &c., advising me of the acceptance by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company of the deed and transfer executed by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to the land grant made by section 22 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871. Letter of acceptance, in same terms, to be filed in your office, will follow in due course of mail.

Please advise me if this action completes the assignment and transfer of this land grant and oblige.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. H. BARNUM,
President New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

Hon. J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner, &c.

On the 21st the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed the following letter to Mr. Barnum:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1881.

SIR: The president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company has duly accepted, in behalf of said company, the deed referred to in my letter addressed to you, dated February 17, 1881, being the deed to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to the grant to said last-named company by the twenty-second section of an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company," &c., approved March 3, 1871.

The transfer by the said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to said grant to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now complete.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

W. H. BARNUM,
President New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

There seems to have been no question made from that time or in the Department that the transfer had been properly made. On the 26th of February this letter also was written, to which I will call attention:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1881.

SIR: On the 17th instant you filed with me certain papers, showing the transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, of the land grant to the former company. You verbally asked me for an expression of opinion as to the effect and sufficiency of the transfer.

On the same day (17th instant) I addressed a letter to Hon. W. H. Barnum, president of the first-named company, expressing the opinion that the transfer would fully vest in the last-named company, upon a formal acceptance thereof by it, all the right, title, and interest of the first-named.

On the 21st instant you filed a letter from Mr. Barnum, dated 19th instant, addressed to me, covering a telegram from E. B. Wheelock, president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, dated New Orleans, 19th instant, being the required acceptance of the transfer.

By letter to Mr. Barnum, dated 21st instant, I acknowledged receipt of his letter and inclosure, and stated that the transfer was not complete.

On the 24th instant you referred a letter dated New York, 23d instant, addressed to you from William M. Barnum, secretary of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, covering the original of the telegram of acceptance, above referred to.

Yesterday you telegraphed me asking if the papers last described had been received; to which I at once responded by telegraph in the affirmative.

All the papers in the case have been filed.

Very respectfully, &c.,

J. A. WILLIAMSON, Commissioner.

Hon. J. H. KETCHAM,
House of Representatives.

On the 15th of the following December the following letter was lodged with the Commissioner of the General Land Office:

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1881.

SIR: I respectfully but most earnestly urge that there be no further delay in the transfer of the land grant originally granted by act of March 3, 1871, to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, and by that corporation transferred to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company by act on file in your office, to the latter company.

As I understand the case, the transfer is legal, and recognized as such by this Department; and the lands have been earned by construction, and a favorable report for 130 miles of constructed road is on file.

Delay is asked that the rights of "squatters" or settlers may be protected. In reply, I beg to state that the laws now in force protect those "bona fide" settlers who went on the lands prior to the grant by Congress. As to settlers who "squatted" on the lands after they were withdrawn, by reason of the grant, they have no rights, for they were in bad faith.

Surely Congress nor the Department can legislate or decide as to rights on lands donated by the Government.

The act of donation by Congress and of acceptance by earning on the part of the grantee parts with the jurisdiction of the Government over the lands donated and earned.

I beg to state that the affairs and operations of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company have been, and are, most seriously embarrassed by the unexpected delay they have met with in obtaining title to their grant; and I respectfully submit that this should not be, merely to attempt the hopeless task by legislation or otherwise of looking after the rights of a few persons who have gone on the lands in bad faith.

I am satisfied that the company will deal justly with settlers. I have had this assurance from its president.

I will gladly co-operate to get favorable terms for them, but this is a matter simply and purely of equity and accommodation between the settlers and the company.

I beg, therefore, to urge that there be as little delay as possible in perfecting the title of the New Orleans Pacific Railway to the grant.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. JNO. ELLIS, M. C., Louisiana.

Hon. S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary of the Interior.

P. S.—I am authorized to state that Senators Jones and Kellogg concur in these views.

E. JNO. ELLIS.

The name here printed "Jones" of course should be "Jonas." On the same day the following also was addressed to the Secretary of the Interior:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1881.

SIR: We respectfully urge that there be as little delay as possible in consummating the transfer of the lands granted to the New Orleans, Vicksburg, and Savannah Railroad Company by act of March 3, 1871, and by that company transferred to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, by an an act of sale now on file in your office, to the latter company.

As we understand, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company has earned by construction its title to the grant, and that all the preliminaries have been complied with, and there remains now but the certification of the lands and the issue of the patents.

The affairs of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company have been much damaged and embarrassed by the protracted delays that have already occurred, and we therefore urge that the matter be expedited as rapidly as possible.

With great respect, we are your obedient servants,

E. JNO. ELLIS,
Second Louisiana District.
B. F. JONAS, U. S. S.
J. FLOYD KING.
W. P. KELLOGG.

Hon. S. J. KIRKWOOD,
Secretary of the Interior.

J. Floyd King was a member of Congress, and Kellogg a member of the Senate. A protest was filed by two members of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana, Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. BLANCHARD, because they thought that the long delay from the time that the grant had been made to the time of the construction of the road had induced settlers to go on these lands who would be injured by the delay. This protest I will not stop to read; but later, on the 4th of January, 1882, while Mr. Kirkwood was Secretary of the Interior, these two members of Congress withdrew their protest, in the following terms:

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1882.

SIR: We hereby withdraw the opposition and protest filed by us to the recognition of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company as the grantees and transferees of the land in Louisiana granted by the act of Congress of 1871 to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and claimed by said New Orleans Pacific Company as transferees of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company.

The object we had in filing said protest was the protection of the rights of settlers on the land covered by said grant, and as that has been obtained by agreement with the company, we do not wish to throw any further obstacle in the way of the recognition by the Department of the Interior of the rights claimed by the company.

The New Orleans Pacific Company have constructed the road running through the grant—that is to say, from New Orleans to Shreveport—and having obtained the funds with which to do so upon the faith of its right to the land grant, we think that justice demands the recognition of their claims to the land.

We are, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

E. W. ROBERTSON,
Member of Congress, Sixth District of Louisiana.
N. C. BLANCHARD,
Member of Congress, Fourth District of Louisiana.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] asks me what the agreement was. The agreement was that the railroad company would dispose of the land at $2 per acre to the settlers, such as had already made settlement at that time. That of course rested entirely on the good faith of the company. There was no way in which the Department could enforce the agreement. This bill confirms whatever interest they may have there, dependent on their acceptance of the provisions, and I will say, and I do not think the Senator from Louisiana will dispute it, that I understand the company have carried it out to the present day in good faith, giving to all these settlers the land at 50 cents an acre less than they could buy Government land by the side of this road.

In 1882 there was introduced in the Senate a bill to confirm to this company this land grant. It went to the Committee on Railroads, of which at that time Mr. Jonas, a member of the Senate from the State of Louisiana, was a member. Mr. Jonas made a report in behalf of the Committee on Railroads in these words:

[Senate Report No. 711, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

JUNE 7, 1882.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Jonas, from the Committee on Railroads, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Railroads, to whom the subject was referred, submit the following report:

A petition has been referred to the Committee on Railroads of certain citizens of Louisiana, asking for the forfeiture of the land grant made to the New Orleans, Vicksburg and Baton Rouge Railroad Company by the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, on the ground that the company to whom the grant was made has failed to build the road within the time prescribed by the act.

The grant was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns. That company was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana, approved December 30, 1869. The object of Congress in making the grant was to aid in the construction of the proposed road, via Baton Rouge, Alexandria, and Shreveport, to connect with the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, and thus connect that road with the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico.

The committee find that this connecting road, on almost the same line, and between the same points (if not built by the original grantees), has been built by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, which was organized under a charter confirmed by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana, approved February 19, 1876. This road is now completed and running between New Orleans and the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, at or near Marshall, Tex., its route being via Baton Rouge, Alexandria, and Shreveport.

The New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company (which still has corporate existence) by deed dated the 5th day of January, 1881, granted and transferred to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company all its right, title, and interest in and to the lands granted to it by the before-mentioned act of Congress incorporating the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. This transfer was approved, ratified, and confirmsd at a meeting of the stockholders of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by a vote of two-thirds of its entire capital stock. The transfer was formally accepted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

The deed of transfer, a certified copy of the resolution of the stockholders of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company ratifying the transfer, and a certified copy of the resolution of the board of directors of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepting the transfer, have been filed in the Department of the Interior.

A commissioner to inspect a portion of the railroad built by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was, upon the application of that company, appointed by the President of the United States, and the report of the said commissioner, approving the construction of the portion of the railroad inspected by him, was duly filed in the Department of the Interior.

Application is now made for the issuance of patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company for the lands granted by Congress to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge, and Vicksburg Railroad, Company, and by the last-named company assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company as heretofore stated.

The grant was originally made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purposes above stated.

The road has been built by the assignee of the grantee, and the objects of the grant have been fully attained.

No forfeiture of the grant was made before the completion of the road, on the grounds alleged, and we think it would be unjust and inequitable to make such forfeiture now when the work has been completed by the assignee company, which has built the road in good faith and in full expectation of receiving the benefit of the grant which remained unforfeited and assignable in the control of their grantor.

Your committee think no consideration of public policy requires the forfeiture of the grant, and they recommend that the committee be discharged from further consideration of the memorial.

The position of the committee can be seen in the last few lines. The committee decided that the transfer was ample to carry the title to the new company and that it did not need any legislation.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question on this point?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. Was there not a protest filed by these same gentlemen against the issue of patents before March, 1884?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will wait until I reach that stage he may put that question. The Senator knows about it; he was one of the signers.

Mr. EUSTIS. I was not one of the signers.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps not. It was very close on to the time the Senator came into the Senate. I will give all the history. If I do not the Senator will be at liberty to give it.

Mr. EUSTIS. I will explain why I ask the question at this particular time. As the Senator has been urging the point that the members of the Louisiana delegation were against the forfeiture and in favor of the issuing of patents, I thought it an opportune time to put the question.

Mr. TELLER. I shall come to that before I get through. The Senator need not be in a hurry about it. There is plenty of time.

In the latter part of 1881, or the early part of 1882, the then Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Kirkwood, received a protest made by some parties here in Washington having no connection with this land whatever, having no connection with the people of the State of Louisiana whatever, appearing, as they stated, for the purpose simply of seeing that the Government was not swindled. Senators can form their own opinion why they appeared. They raised the question whether there had been a valid grant. Mr. Kirkwood, the then Secretary of the Interior, submitted to the then Attorney-General, Mr. Brewster, the question whether or not there had been a legal transfer made.

This involved not only the question, first, as to the legality of the proceedings of these railroad companies in making the transfer, but also the question whether the law authorized such a transfer to be made. Upon the latter point there was no necessity for having that opinion, because it had already been settled by the opinions of five Attorneys-General of the United States that there could be a valid assignment of a grant of this character. Mr. Brewster, the then Attorney-General, on the 13th day of June, 1882, submitted to the Interior Department his opinion, in which he held that the transfer was legal and proper and that these parties were entitled to the land. This is his opinion:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., June 13, 1882.

SIR: By a letter dated the 5th of January last, your predecessors submitted to me a number of questions arising upon an application of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company for certain lands claimed under the land grant made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, chapter 122.

The land grant mentioned is contained in the twenty-second section of that act, which provides:

"That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect, by the most eligible route to be selected by said company, with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by the way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile, in the State of Louisana, as are by this act granted in the State of California to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption, upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company, within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act."

The eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, as fixed by the same act, was a point at or near Marshall, Tex.

The New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana passed December 30, 1869, which authorized it to construct and operate a railroad "from any point on the line of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad, within the parish of Livingston, running from thence to any point on the boundary line dividing the States of Louisiana and Mississippi," the route here indicated lying east of the Mississippi River. It was also authorized to construct and operate a branch railroad from its main line (above described) to the city of Baton Rouge; and for the purpose of connecting its railroad with the railroads of other companies, &c., it was furthermore authorized "to construct, maintain, and use, by running thereon its engines and cars, such branch railroads and tracks as it may find necessary and expedient to own and use;" and such branch railroads were, for all the purposes of the act, to be deemed and taken to constitute a part of the main line of its railroads within the State of Louisiana.

On November 11, 1871, that company filed in the General Land Office a map designating the general route of a road projected thereby from Shreveport, by way of Alexandria, to Baton Rouge, and thereupon a withdrawal of the public lands along the same was ordered, which became effective in December following.

Subsequently, by an act of the Legislature of Louisiana passed December 11, 1872, the same company was given "full power and authority to commence the construction of their road in the city of New Orleans or Shreveport, or at any intermediate point on their line of road, as may best suit the convenience of said company and facilitate the speedy construction of a continuous line from the city of New Orleans to the city of Shreveport, or perfect railroad communication with the Texas Pacific Railroad or any other railroad in Northwestern Louisiana, at or near the Louisiana State line: Provided, however, That the said company shall construct the line of its road between the city of New Orleans and the city of Baton Rouge, on the east side of the Mississippi River, to the corporate limits of the said city of Baton Rouge, or adjacent thereto."

In the mean time, by the act of Congress of May 2, 1872, chapter 132, the Texas and Pacific Railway Company (formerly styled the Texas Pacific Railroad Company) was "authorized and required to construct, maintain, control, and operate a road between Marshall, Tex., and Shreveport, La., or control and operate any existing road between said points, of the same gauge as the Texas and Pacific Railroad." The same act further provided that "all roads terminating at Shreveport shall have the right to make the same running connections, and shall be entitled to the same privileges, for the transaction of business in connection with the said Texas and Pacific Railway, as are granted to roads intersecting therewith."

On February 13, 1873, a second map was filed in the General Land Office by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, designating the general route of a road projected thereby from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and a withdrawal of the public lands along the same was ordered, which took effect in April, 1873. The route between those places, those designated, lies on the east side of the Mississippi River. That company has not constructed any part of its road, either on the route between New Orleans and Baton Rouge or on the route between the latter place and Shreveport; nor, indeed, has there been a definite location of its road anywhere between the points mentioned. Nothing beyond the designation of the general route thereof appears.

Pursuant to a resolution of its board of directors, adopted December 29, 1880, all the right, title, and interest of that company in and to the aforesaid grant of public lands made by the act of March 3, 1871, were deeded by it to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company. This action of the board of directors and officers of the former company was afterwards approved and ratified by the stockholders thereof at a meeting held in December, 1881.

The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was originally incorporated under the general laws of the State of Louisiana in June, 1875. Its charter was subsequently amended by acts of the Louisiana Legislature passed February 19, 1876, and February 5, 1878. It is thereby authorized to construct a railroad "beginning at a point on the Mississippi River at New Orleans or between New Orleans and the parish of Iberville, on the right bank of the Mississippi, and Baton Rouge, on the left bank, &c., or from any point within the limits of this State, and running thence toward and to the city of Shreveport," which is made its northwestern terminus.

The route of this company as projected is understood to extend from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and thence, by way of Alexandria, to Shreveport. Between New Orleans and Baton Rouge it lies on the west side of the Mississippi River; while the designated route of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, between the same points, lies on the east side of that river. Between Baton Rouge and Shreveport its general course and direction corresponds, in the main, with the route designated by the last-named company. It is throughout its entire length from New Orleans to Shreveport within the limits of the before-mentioned withdrawals of public lands.

In October, 1881, the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company made affidavit that three sections of its road were then completed and ready for examination by the Government; whereupon a commissioner was appointed to examine the same, the result of whose examination appears in a report made by him to the Secretary of the Interior, under date of the 26th of that month. One of the sections embraces 68 miles of road, beginning on the west bank of the Mississippi River, opposite New Orleans, and ending near the town of Donaldsonville; another embraces 20 miles of road near Alexandria; and the third embraces 50 miles of road terminating at Shreveport. For each of these sections lands are claimed by that company under the aforesaid land grant, as assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company.

No map of definite location of any portion of its road has been filed, other than those of constructed portions.

It appears that in February, 1881, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company purchased from Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company the road constructed on the west bank of the Mississippi River by the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad Company, from Westmego to White Castle, a distance of 68 miles, and that the same has become a part of the main line of the road of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

The following are the questions submitted:

"1. Was the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company a grant in præsenti?

"2. Had the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, at the date of its alleged transfer of lands to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, such an interest in the lands, under said act, as was assignable?

"3. Is the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company such a successor to or assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company as is contemplated by said act?

"4. Should it appear that the 68 miles of the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad was constructed prior to the act of March 3, 1871, granting lands to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, can the New Orleans Pacific Company (its assignee) claim any benefit from the grant? Or, in case of such prior construction, and the non-construction of any portion of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg road, has the purpose for which the grant was made failed and the grant consequently lapsed?

"5. If the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas road was constructed subsequently to the date of said act, is so much of its road as is now owned by the New Orleans Pacific Company such a road as is contemplated for acceptance by the President within the meaning of said act, and may patents issue to the latter for lands opposite to and coterminous with such constructed portion of road?"

These questions are accompanied by a request for an opinion upon such other questions of law as may suggest themselves touching the transfer of said land grant, to which reference is above made.

Of the above-stated questions the first three may be considered together, in connection with the following inquiry, which presents itself at the outset, whether the assent of Congress to the transfer made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its interest in said land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is necessary (by reason of anything in the provisions of the grant itself) to entitle the latter company to the benefit of said grant in aid of the construction of the road projected by it.

The act of March 3, 1871, passed to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company a present interest in a certain number of alternate sections of public lands per mile within the limits there prescribed. Its language is "there is hereby granted to said company" the number of alternate sections mentioned; words which import a grant in præsenti, and not one in futuro, or the promise of a grant. (97 U. S. Rep., 496.) But the grant thus made is in the nature of a float. It is of sections to be afterward located, their location depending upon the establishment of the line of the road. Until this is definitely fixed the grant does not attach to any specific tracts of land. Upon the line of the road being definitely located the grant then first acquires precision, and the company becomes invested with an inchoate title to the particular lands covered thereby, which can ripen into a perfect title only as the construction of each section of 20 miles of road is completed and approved, when the right to patents for the lands opposite to and coterminous with such constructed section accrues.

The proviso in the grant that the company shall complete the whole of its road within five years from the date of the act is a condition-subsequent, the failure to perform which does not, ipso facto, work a forfeiture of the grant, but only gives rise to a right in the Government to enforce a forfeiture thereof. Yet in order to enforce a forfeiture such right must be asserted by a judicial proceeding, authorized by law, or by some legislative action amounting to a resumption of the grant. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wall., 44.) Hence, until advantage is taken of the non-performance of the condition, under legislative authority, the interest of the grantee in the grant remains unimpaired thereby.

Such being the nature and effect of the grant and its accompanying condition, and no action having been taken either by legislation or judicial proceedings to enforce a forfeiture thereof, it follows that at the period of said transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company this company was invested with a present interest in the number of alternate sections of public lands per mile granted by the act of 1871, notwithstanding it was already in default in the performance of the condition referred to, and that it still retained a right to proceed with the construction of the road in aid of which the grant was made until advantage should be taken of the default. But as it had not then definitely fixed the line of its road, although a map designating the general route thereof was duly filed, that interest did not attach to any specific tracts of land, but remained afloat, as it were, needing a definite location of the road before it could become thus attached. Was the interest here described assignable to another company, so as to entitle the latter to the benefit of the grant in aid of the construction of its road between the places named therein, without the assent of Congress?

Doubt has perhaps arisen on this point in view of the fact that in one or two instances it has been thought expedient to obtain legislation by Congress confirming or authorizing a similar assignment (see section 2 of the act of March 3, 1865, chapter 88, and section 1 of the act of March 3, 1869, chapter 127), and also in view of the adverse ruling of this Department in the case of the Oregon Central Railroad Company. (13 Opin., 382.) However a similar assignment made in 1866 by the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company to the Pike's Peak Railroad Company, afterward known as the Central Branch Company, was held to be valid by Attorney-General Stanberry in an opinion given to the Secretary of the Treasury under date of July 25, 1866.

In the latter case the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company, which was incorporated by the State of Missouri, with authority to construct a railroad between Hannibal and Saint Joseph, within that State, was, by the Pacific Railroad act of July 1, 1862 (section 13), authorized to "extend its road from Saint Joseph, via Atchison, to connect and unite with the road through Kansas, * * * and may for this purpose use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas," &c. And by the fifteenth section of the same act it was provided that "wherever the word company is used in this act it shall be construed to embrace the words their associates, successors, and assigns, the same as if the words had been properly added thereto." Subsequently, in 1863, an assignment was made by that company of all its rights under said act (which included an interest in both a land and a bond subsidy) to the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company, a company previously organized under a charter granted by the Legislature of Kansas. The latter company having constructed a section of 20 miles of the proposed road west from Atchison claimed the benefit of the grant made to the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company, as its assignee, and this claim was recognized and allowed, in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General. It will be observed, however, that the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Company was authorized to "use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas," and this, together with the provision in the fifteenth section, quoted above, may have been regarded as sufficient to sustain the assignment.

In the case of the Oregon Central Railroad Company, mentioned above, a grant of a right of way through the public lands, and also of alternate sections thereof, was made to that company, "and to their successors and assigns," by the act of May 4, 1870, chapter 69, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line between certain places in Oregon. In August following an instrument was executed by the company assigning all its interest in the grant to the Willamette Valley Railroad Company, and thereupon the question arose whether the grant was susceptible of being thus transferred. The Attorney-General (Mr. Akerman), to whom the question was submitted, after reviewing the various provisions of the act, some of which (see section 5) imposed certain duties and required certain important acts to be performed by the company, decided in the negative, holding that, upon consideration of those provisions, the Oregon Central Company was alone within the contemplation of Congress in respect of the donation made and duties imposed by that act. The words "their successors and assigns," as used in the act, were regarded as words of limitation merely.

But the grounds upon which that decision appears to have been based are not found to exist in the case now under consideration. Here a grant of a certain number of alternate sections of public lands per mile is made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, in aid of the construction of a road from New Orleans, by the route indicated, to connect with the eastern terminus of the Texas and Pacific Railroad, which lands are required to be "withdrawn from the market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company." The grant is coupled with no special duties or trusts, for the performance of which there is reason to believe the particular company named therein was more acceptable to Congress than any other. Its purpose is to secure the construction of a railroad between the points designated, and whether this purpose be fulfilled by that company or by another company must be deemed unimportant in the absence of any provision indicative of the contrary. The interest derived by the grantee, though it remain only afloat, is a vested interest, and it is held under the same limitations which apply after it develops into an estate in particular lands until extinguished by forfeiture for non-performance of the condition annexed to the grant. I perceive no legal obstacle arising out of the grant itself to a transfer of such interest by the grantee to another company, and should the latter construct the road contemplated agreeably to the requirements of the grant, and thus accomplish the end which Congress had in view, I submit that it would clearly be entitled to the benefits thereof.

The question of the assignability of the interest of the grantee would be more difficult if, after definitely locating the line of its road, and thus attaching the grant to particular lands along the same, it was proposed to transfer that interest to another company for the benefit of a road to be constructed by the latter on a different line, though following the general course of the other road. But in the present case the facts give rise to no such difficulty. The grant had not previous to the transfer become thus identified with a particular line of road, and was thereafter susceptible of location upon the line of the road projected by the assignee (the New Orleans Pacific Company), provided this road met the requirements of the grant in other respects, as to which no doubt is suggested.

My conclusion is that the assent of Congress to the assignment made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, as above, is not necessary in order to entitle the assignee to the benefit of the land grant in question.

The remaining questions relate to the 68 miles of railroad formerly belonging to the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroad Company, but now owned by the New Orleans Pacific Company, and made a part of its main line between New Orleans and Baton Rouge.

The land grant in question was, as its language imports, made in aid of the construction of a railroad between certain termini, contemplating a road to be constructed, not one already constructed. It has not been the policy of Congress thus to aid constructed roads. Had a constructed road existed at the date of the grant, which extended from one terminus to the other, and afterward the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, instead of entering upon and completing the construction of a road, had purchased the road already constructed, this, it seems to me, would not have satisfied the purposes of the grant so as to entitle the company to the benefit thereof. The same objection would apply were the constructed road extended over only a part of the route contemplated by the grant. So far as I am advised the action of the Government hitherto has accorded with this view. On the other hand, if such road was constructed subsequently to the date of the grant, and is owned by the grantee or the assignee of the latter, I see no ground for excluding it from the benefit of the grant should it otherwise fulfill the requirements thereof.

Agreeably to the foregoing views, and in direct response to the several questions submitted, I have the honor to reply as follows: The first, second, and third questions I answer in the affirmative. The fourth question (including the alternative added thereto) I answer in the negative. The fifth question I answer in the affirmative—assuming, as I do, the company named therein to be an assignee of the grantee in the act referred to.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

When this came to the Interior Department, what was the duty of that Department? If the Interior Department is to be charged with any misconduct or with any dereliction of duty whatever it is that upon that opinion it did not at once issue to this company the patent to these lands. It had been decided as early as the days of the attorney-generalship of Mr. Wirt, it had been re-recognized by the great lawyer, Reverdy Johnson, of the State of Maryland, as a duty that was incumbent on a Department when it had submitted a question of this kind to the Attorney-General to be bound by his decision. I called attention to the authorities on that subject on a former occasion and they never have been questioned, and I do not propose now to spend time to go over them. Reverdy Johnson says it is a quasi-judicial proceeding, and the Department was bound to recognize the title of these parties because the Attorney-General had so declared, the question having been submitted to him under the provisions of law for his determination thereon.

After this decision of the Attorney-General there were some steps taken in the House of Representatives, perhaps in both Houses of Congress, looking to the forfeiture of this grant. A member of Congress then, of the State of Illinois, entered with the Secretary of the Interior a protest against issuing the patents, and arraigning the decision of the Attorney-General. The subject had been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Subsequently this same member of Congress, by letter of December 15, 1882, withdrew his protest and declared that an examination of the case had satisfied him that this company was entitled to these lands. On the same day he also notified the Department that he had withdrawn the resolution then pending before the Judiciary Committee looking to the forfeiture of the land grant. This is his letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1882.

DEAR SIR: In October last I had the honor to address you (as well as the President) a note on the subject of the land grant made in aid of the construction of the Memphis, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, now claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, in which letters I requested a suspension of Department action until I could, as a member of the Judiciary Committee of the House, be heard upon the matter—as it was pending before that committee on a resolution offered by myself, declaring a forfeiture of the grant—and that the legal question, as I understood it, was identical with that involved in the Texas Pacific grant, now claimed by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and that also the rights of many settlers in good faith were involved, so that in my judgment action might properly and should be delayed until further investigation should be had, as well as to the status of the grant as to the protection of parties in possession, as settlers on the public domain, claiming adversely to the railroad company.

At the date of my writing, the matter had not been examined in committee, and all that was known to me was what appeared in the opinion of the Attorney-General of date June 13, 1882, and the public statutes.

You kindly held the matter, as I desired, until my arrival here, and until I could examine the matter to my satisfaction, and as I have concluded that under the law, as well as the equities of the case, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is entitled to the grant (except as to 68 miles of road referred to below, as purchased, instead of constructed), it is only proper that I should state to you the additional facts I have gleaned since my return here bearing on the case.

I find that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company had been struggling for years to obtain credit with which to build the road, but was unsuccessful; that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company having the same terminal points, namely, New Orleans and Shreveport, and its line of route practically coincident throughout its entire length with that of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and all its line so within and near the middle of the grant (an important fact not so stated to me last session nor so understood), purchased of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company the grant for the purpose of utilizing it in the building of the railroad, to connect the two cities, and making connection between San Francisco and New Orleans, as contemplated by the granting act.

I find that on December 9, 1880, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company resolved to convey this grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

That on January 15, 1881, the same company made a conveyance to the last-named company of the grant. That on February 3, 1881, this deed and conveyance was accepted by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company.

That before the New Orleans Pacific proceeded with the building of its road, or obtaining money therefor, the opinion of the Interior Department was sought as to the validity of the transfer; and on that date the Commissioner of the General Land Office wrote the president of the company that "when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts the transfer made by the resolution and deed of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, it, the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, will be fully vested with the right to the grant."

On February 21, 1881, after the Department was notified that the grant had been conveyed to and accepted by the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, the Commissioner of the General Land Office wrote the president of the company, after reciting the facts as to the conveyance, "that the transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interest in and to the said grant to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now complete."

Upon this recognition the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company proceeded to build and complete its road, basing its expenditures for that purpose upon faith in the validity of the transfer and the opinions of the Commissioner.

In the construction of its line, however, it utilized 68 miles of road purchased of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, extending from Westmego to White Castle, which piece of road had been built before the granting act was passed. I find, also, that the road was recognized as a land-grant road, after the conveyance and during its construction, by Secretary Kirkwood, in his annual report for 1881 (Executive Document I, part 5, p. 16); that "130 miles of the New Orleans Pacific have recently been examined, but not accepted, and that 123 additional miles are now ready for examination," and in later Department documents the same recognition.

Besides the opinion of the Attorney-General, that the New Orleans Pacific is legally entitled to the grant, I see the Senate Committee on Railroads has unanimously reported in favor of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company's right to the grant, and that there are no considerations of public policy requiring any interference with it.

I have ascertained by conference with them that both the Senators and the delegation in the House from Louisiana do not favor forfeiture, interposing no objections to immediate action.

On the question of the rights of settlers, I am advised by several of the members of the House from Louisiana—some of whom, representing the districts in which the major part of this grant lies, participated in the drawing of the agreement—that the claimant company has contracted and bound itself that all settlers on the sections allotted to the railroad company shall be protected, and have their lands at a price not exceeding $2 per acre, on deferred payments at low interest.

That contract is now before me, having been submitted by one of the Louisiana delegation most interested, and in my judgment fully protects the settlers.

The difference between the Texas Pacific case and this to me is that this road was constructed on the faith of the grant and before adverse opposition or action; the Southern Pacific was built by a company asserting that it neither needed nor wanted Government aid and without reference to a grant.

These considerations dispose of my objections entertained at the last session (and indicated in my letters to you and the President) to proceeding under the act, and I withdraw the request I made relative to suspension of action until I could investigate and be heard.

I owe you an apology for the length of this communication; but, as you know, I have always taken a decided stand as to all land grants wherein there was either a failure of performance or not strong grounds for equitable considerations as to declaring forfeitures.

In this case I am satisfied from the facts, and for the reasons stated, that it would be improper for me further to interfere and that it would be unjust and inequitable to do so; that the rights of the settlers are fully protected, and I shall at the earliest opportunity in committee withdraw the resolution I have offered for the forfeiture of this grant.

Thanking you for the consideration shown me,
I remain yours, truly,
L. E. PAYSON.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary, &c.

(Indorsements:) Hon. L. E. PAYSON, House of Representatives, December 15, 1882. Concerning the land grant claimed by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

Referred to the Assistant Attorney-General.

H. M. TELLER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of this date, I have the honor to state that, at the meeting of the Judiciary Committee this day, I formally withdraw the resolution pending, which I offered last session.

Yours, truly,
L. E. PAYSON.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary, &c.

Before that time, Mr. Kirkwood had appointed commissioners to examine this road. The commissioners had examined the road and reported to Mr. Kirkwood, as Secretary of the Interior, or to the President, as the case may have been. There had been no transmittal of this to the President until March, 1883, when the Secretary of the Interior transmitted by letter to the President a statement of the case in this form:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 13, 1883.

SIR: The New Orleans Pacific Railway Company applied to this Department more than a year ago for a transfer to itself of the lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the twenty-second section of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, presenting, at the same time, satisfactory proofs of said transfer as between the two companies. I have delayed action thereon for many months, against the persistent pressure of parties in interest, in the expectation that Congress might legislate upon the subject-matter thereof; but that body having adjourned without action thereon, and knowing of no reason for further delay, I have now the honor to submit the same for your consideration.

In reply to my predecessor's request of January 5, 1882, the Attorney-General, under date of June 12 ultimo, submitted to him an opinion (copy herewith) that the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was a grant in præsenti; that that company had an assignable interest in the lands granted to it; that the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is such a successor to or assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Company as is contemplated by the act of March 3, 1871; that even if the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas road was constructed subsequently to the date of said act, so much of its road as is now owned by the New Orleans Pacific Company is such a road as is contemplated for acceptance by the President within the meaning of said act, and that patents may issue to the latter company for lands opposite to, and coterminous with, such constructed portion of road.

I also submit herewith a copy of the report of the Senate Committee on Railroads (under date of June 7, 1882), declaring that, in its judgment, no considerations of public policy require a forfeiture of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company; and also two letters (herewith) under date of December 15 last, from Hon. L. E. Payson, of the House Judiciary Committee, in one of which he notifies this Department that upon that day, at a meeting of the committee, he had formally withdrawn the pending resolution offered by him at the previous session of Congress for a forfeiture of said grant. In the other, after stating his request in October last for a suspension of Department action, until he could be heard before the House Judiciary Committee upon the matter, he elaborately discusses the questions involved, and announcing that, after conference with them, the Senators and House delegation from Louisiana interpose no opposition to immediate action by this Department, and that his own objections are disposed of and withdrawn, states his conclusions that the New Orleans Pacific Company is entitled to the grant, both under the law and the equities of the case, and that the rights of settlers are fully protected.

I have also the honor to submit herewith two reports on the New Orleans Pacific Railway by Mr. Thomas Hassard, whom you appointed commissioner to examine completed portions of said railway.

The first report bears date 26th of October, 1881, and has not been submitted to you at an earlier date on account of the controversies heretofore in question.

The portions of said railway examined and at that time reported on extend from the west bank of the Mississippi River, opposite Thalia street, New Orleans, La., in a northwesterly direction, near said river, 60 miles, to near the town of Donaldsonville, in township 11 south, range 15 east; also from Bayou Lamourie, in township 2 north, range 1 east, to a point in township 4 north, range 2 west, a distance of 20 miles; also from the junction of said railway with the Texas and Pacific Railway, in Shreveport, La., southwardly to township 10 north, range 12 west, a distance of 50 miles.

The second report bears date 15th November, 1882, and relates to such portions of said railway as were not examined and reported on in October, 1881, amounting to 198 miles, lying between New Orleans and Shreveport.

The commissioner reports said portions of road, 323 miles in all, as constructed in substantial compliance with law and the instructions of this Department.

In view of the facts and the law of the case, I regard the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company as the lawful assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and entitled to the lands granted by the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871, to said latter named company, and to patents therefor in so far as it has earned or hereafter may earn the same under that act, with the exception below named, and recommend that you accept said 328 miles of said road, less and exclusive of 68 miles of the line of said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Road, extending from New Orleans to White Castle, between New Orleans and Shreveport (to which 68 miles the New Orleans Pacific road has withdrawn its claim and right to receive lands under the twenty-second section of said act) and that patents for such lands as may have been earned by the construction be issued to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company (exclusive, nevertheless, of lands along said 68 miles) on their compliance with the law and regulations in such case made and provided.

These patents will, of course, be subject to rights acquired by any person or corporation prior to the act of March 3, 1871.

Requesting that the inclosures herewith be returned to this Department when no longer needed for the purposes hereof,

I am, very respectfully,
H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

This came to the President, and was indorsed as follows:

Department of the Interior, March 13, 1883. H. M. Teller, Secretary, submits to the President report of commissioner on 328 miles of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad, with recommendations.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 16, 1883.

The within recommendations are approved.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

The recommendations were, of course, that the company should be entitled to their lands. The Secretary of the Interior submitted to the Land Office the following:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 19, 1883.

SIR: I transmit herewith, for appropriate action, copy of my letter of the 13th instant to the President, with recommendations, inclosing two reports of Mr. Thomas Hassard, commissioner, on 328 miles of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad in Louisiana, with the President's indorsement thereon, approving the recommendations. A copy of the Attorney-General's opinion, of 13th June last, on questions relating to said road, and various maps, profiles, and papers, accompanying said reports, or filed in the case, will also be found herewith.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. President, these are substantially the proceedings in the Department relative to this road until the fall of 1883, at which time a protest was filed, not by people in the State of Louisiana but by people outside, protesting against the issue of the patent. There was nothing done in the Department during the fall of 1883 or the winter of 1884, or, in fact, until the spring of 1885. There were during that time pending in Congress bills either in one branch or in both for the forfeiture of these lands. These bills came before the House on a report from the Committee on Public Lands, and were, on a yea-and-nay vote, defeated by a majority of 43 on the final vote, the House deciding that the company were entitled to their lands.

At or about that time Mr. E. John Ellis, of the State of Louisiana, submitted some resolutions to the House, and had them referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of determining this simple question, Is this assignee railroad company entitled, under existing law, as it now stands, to a patent for these lands? I have read to the Senate before, and can do it now, if it is necessary, the opinion of that committee.

The committee took into consideration this question of law submitted to them by the House, and reported to the House—thirteen out of fifteen members—that there was no power on the part of the General Government to forfeit this grant, that the Government had allowed the time to elapse in which it might have forfeited it, and that the title was vested in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. In that case the road was completed after the time fixed for the completion of the whole road, was it not?

Mr. TELLER. It was. I will not assume to go into the details of that report. It is enough to say that the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives fully sustained the former action of the House in declining to forfeit this grant.

In a former discussion I took occasion to mention the members of the Judiciary Committee by name, and to call the attention of the Senate to the character of the men who composed that committee. At the head of the committee was then, as now, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, and other men of equal national reputation and fame were also members of the committee. I have before me the report of the House Judiciary Committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, which I may as well submit to the Senate in this connection.

[House Report No. 1556, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

EDWARD B. WHEELOCK, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW ORLEANS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

May 17, 1884, referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany Miscellaneous Document 54):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which has been referred House resolution No. 232, and the memorial of Edward B. Wheelock in respect to the same matter, beg leave to report upon said memorial as follows:

By act of the Legislature of Louisiana approved December 30, 1869, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was chartered, with a provision that the said company "shall possess and enjoy the rights and franchises granted to said company by the State of Louisiana in this act and heretofore; and such grants and the engagements herein made and entered into on the part of the State of Louisiana shall be deemed to be, and shall be, binding contracts between the State of Louisiana and the said company, not to be impaired, disturbed, or modified by subsequent legislation, except with the consent and on the petition of said company."

In article 447, Code of Louisiana, the general law provides that—

"A corporation legally established may be dissolved—

"First. By an act of the Legislature, if they deem it necessary or convenient to the public interest; provided that when the act of incorporation imports a contract, on the faith of which individuals have advanced money or engaged their property, it cannot be repealed without providing for the reimbursement of the advances made or making full indemnity to such individuals.

"Second. By the forfeiture of their charter, when the corporation abuses its privileges or refuses to accomplish the conditions on which such privileges were granted, in which case the corporation becomes extinct by the effect of the violation of the conditions of the act of incorporation."

This railroad was known as the Backbone Railroad. It was authorized to construct a road from New Orleans to Shreveport and to Baton Rouge, an intermediate point, upon the east side of the Mississippi River.

By act approved April 30, 1877, the Legislature repealed the said charter Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 12, 13, Forty-eighth Congress).

The first question presented for consideration is as to the effect of this repealing act. The committee hold it of no effect, because—

First. It was in violation of the terms of the charter, being without the consent and not upon the petition of the company.

Second. Bonds had been issued by the company upon money loaned to it; and in the repealing act no provision was made for reimbursement of money, or for indemnity, as required by article 447 of the code.

On both grounds the repealing act was void and of no effect. And the circuit court of the fifth circuit of Louisiana so decided in the case of Counsellor vs. New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, the record of which may be found in Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 13-16.

The necessity of settling this as a preliminary question will hereafter appear, as it affects the capacity of the said company to make the deed under which the New Orleans Pacific Company claims.

Congress with a view, as appears by the legislation of the period, to securing a continuous line of railway communication along the thirty-second parallel, from San Diego, in California, to the Mississippi River, at New Orleans, incorporated the Texas Pacific (afterward the Texas and Pacific) Railroad Company by several acts, one approved March 3, 1871, and the other May 2, 1872.

The first of these acts made Marshall, in Texas, and San Deigo, in California, the termini of the road (section 1). The ninth section of the act made land grants by alternate sections, twenty thereof in Texas, ten in California, on each side of the railroad, to aid in its construction, &c. The twelfth and eighteenth sections provided for issue of patents to said company upon completion of each section of the road, on the order of the President of the United States to the Secretary of the Interior, upon a report made to the President by a commissioner to be appointed by him, of the full completion thereof as in the act provided.

By the fifth section of the last of these acts the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company was authorized and required to construct, maintain, control, and operate, or to control and operate any existing road between Marshall, in Texas, and Shreveport, in Louisiana, with privilege to all roads terminating at Shreveport to make and have running connections for business with the Texas and Pacific Company.

Comparing this section with the twenty-second section of the first act above mentioned, by which Congress granted lands to the Backbone Company to aid in its construction to unite with the Texas and Pacific Railway, it is very obvious that Congress contemplated making a continuous chain of railways from New Orleans to San Diego, of which the Backbone Company would furnish one link from New Orleans to Shreveport, the Texas and Pacific another from San Diego to Marshall on its own proper line, and another and final link from Marshall to Shreveport, provided for by the fifth section of the above act of May 2, 1872. This was the ruling idea of Congress—to use its own charter and that of the States of Texas and Louisiana to achieve the great result of a continuous communication from the Mississippi to the Pacific. And in order to make the line available for San Francisco, by the twenty-third section of the above act of March 3, 1871, the Southern Pacific Railroad, chartered by the State of California, was authorized to be connected with the Texas and Pacific Railway, at or near the Colorado River, in order to make the through connection from the Mississippi to the Golden Gate of the Pacific.

Bearing in mind this general purpose, and the means by which it was proposed to attain it, attention will now be directed to the seventeenth and twenty-second sections of the act of Congress, March 3, 1871, upon the construction of which the answers to the questions submitted to the committee depend.

Before proceeding to the interpretation of these sections, it will be well to state certain conceded facts:

1. The Backbone Company never constructed their road at all, nor earned the land grant made by the twenty-second section, and allowed the whole five years fixed for its completion from the date of said act to elapse without doing any work on its line.

2. The Backbone Company, at a special meeting of its board of directors held December 29, 1881, ordered a deed to be made of all the land granted to it by the act of March 3, 1871, to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. The deed was made January 5, 1881 (date in deed erroneously recited as January 5, 1880), in accordance with said order, and the act was confirmed by the meeting of its stockholders December 9, 1881. All these facts appear in Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 21, 22, 23-39, 40, 41, 42. And while some criticism has been made upon these proceedings and their good faith, nothing appears to your committee to impeach their legality. The said deed was duly accepted by the grantee.

3. The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by the State of Louisiana June 29, 1875, and under act of its Legislature, approved February 19, 1876 (Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 17-20). By its third article it had power to construct a road from Shreveport to New Orleans, or a point on the right bank of the Mississippi, or from any other points; to obtain and receive by purchase grant from the United States, real and personal property; to purchase from any railroad company its charter, franchises, or property, &c.

4. The New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, after obtaining said deed from the Backbone Company, applied to the General Land Office and Interior Department for information as to the recognition of the validity of the transfer of land to it on the part of the authorities of the United States. The events which led to this may be noted in order.

February 3, 1881. Resolution of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company authorizing its president to accept the grant. On the 17th of February a letter of Commissioner Williamson to Mr. Barnum, president of the Backbone Company, which closes as follows (Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 23-24):

"There can be no doubt that when the president of the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company accepts said transfer the company will be fully vested with all the right, title, and interest which the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company has in and to said grant."

On the 19th of February, 1881, the New Orleans Pacific Company accepted the grant, and on the 21st of February Commissioner Williamson wrote to Mr. Barnum, president of the Backbone Company, in these words:

"The transfer by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of all its right, title, and interests in and to said grant to the said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is now complete." (Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 24, 25.)

These events in their order show that before its acceptance of the grant of lands the New Orleans Pacific Company was careful to be satisfied that their titles would be effectual, and for the reason, which fully appears from the affidavits of G. M. Dodge and E. G. Wheelock, that they did not intend to undertake to build the road along the general line of the Backbone Company without the Congressional land grant to that company as a basis of credit upon which to proceed securely.

Much contention seems to have arisen over the whole matter, as appears in Executive Document No. 13, which ended in the opinion of Attorney-General Brewster, dated June 13, 1882, upon the validity of the assignment. (See pages 52-55.) That opinion held that the Congressional grant to the Backbone Company was legally assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Company, and was a grant in præsenti.

The Attorney-General, however, indicated a distinction of great importance in this connection. Where a grant of land is assigned to a company to aid it in the construction of the road contemplated by the grant, it will avail the assignee as it would have availed the original grantee. But where a grant of land in aid of construction has not been used for the purpose by the grantee, and another company has constructed the line of road, and afterward takes an assignment of the land grant, such assignment will be invalid.

The reason is obvious. The benefit of the grant to the original company is coupled with the duty of using the lands for construction of the road. Any other company which takes the assignment of the lands must take them with the same burden and for the same purpose. They are granted to aid in constructing—not to pay for construction already done. Construction is a condition-subsequent annexed to the grant, and it operates upon every assignee of the grant—and his performance of the condition involves construction as incident to his title as assignee; and no construction of the road prior to his title as assignee of the grant can be imputed as a performance of a condition annexed to the grant with which at the time of construction the assignee had no privity.

His construction of the road in such case is independent of the grant—has no relation to it—and can in no way be held to be a performance of the condition which will save the grant from forfeiture; for the grantee has not fulfilled it, while holding the grant, and the supposed fulfillment by the other party was before any title by assignment.

In this case the Backbone Company, at the date of its deed of assignment of this land grant to the New Orleans Pacific Company, had fulfilled no part of the condition of its grant. The assignee company stepped into its shoes for the land grant and to use it in aid of performing the condition with which it was connected. It took the land cum onere. It would not have borne the burden, except for its buying the benefit. It cautiously inquired whether in construction of this line it would secure as assignee the granted aid from Congress. Supposing it had done so, it claims the aid, and the question remains, is its claim valid, and has it been or can it be forfeited?"

To the interpretation of the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871, it is now necessary to proceed. It reads as follows:

"SEC. 22. That the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, chartered by the State of Louisiana, shall have the right to connect by the most eligible route to be selected by said company with the said Texas Pacific Railroad at its eastern terminus, and shall have the right of way through the public land to the same extent granted hereby to the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence by the way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands, per mile, in the State of Louisiana, as are by this act granted in the State of California, to said Texas Pacific Railroad Company; and said lands shall be withdrawn from the market, selected, and patents issued therefor, and opened for settlement and pre-emption, upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company, within said State of California: Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act."

The first question in regard to this section is, what does it convey?

Its language is clear—that "in aid of its construction * * * there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns," so much land.

The case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman (21 Wallace, 44) is complete authority to the point, that these words import a grant in præsenti (see also Railroad Company vs. Baldwin, 103 United States Supreme Court, 426; Grinnell vs. Railroad Company, ibid., 742-3).

Nor can there be any doubt of the right of the grantee company to assign the land grant. The jus disponendi is incident to the title granted, even if the word "assigns" did not imply such right, as it clearly does (Lewis vs. Lewis, 9 Mees. & W., 664; Bailey vs. De Crespigny, L. R. 4 Q. B., 186; Watson vs. Donnelly, 28 Barbour, 658; Furney vs. Ford, 22 Wisc., 173; Ball vs. Chadwick, 46 Ill., 32).

Whether the grant was absolute, or was upon condition-subsequent, or was coupled with a trust enforceable by the grantor, depends upon other words in the section.

It was clearly not an absolute and indefeasible title and free from trust or condition.

The last clause of the section is in these words:

"Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act."

These words are appropriate to the creation of a condition-subsequent, on the non-fulfillment of which the estate granted would determine upon the re-entry of the grantor for its breach. And there is no doubt in this view that, as there was a breach of the condition by the grantee company, the right of the United States to enter is unquestionable.

Before proceeding to discuss the relative rights of the Government and of the assignee company under this view it is proper to consider the alternative views insisted on for the assignee.

And first, it is claimed for the assignee that the seventeenth section of the act of March 3, 1871, is to be read and construed as affecting and modifying the provisions of the twenty-second section of the act.

That section is as follows:

"SEC. 17. That the said Texas Paacific Railrod Company shall commence the construction of its road simultaneously at San Diego, in the State of California, and from a point at or near Marshall, Tex., as hereinbefore described, and so prosecute the same as to have at least fifty consecutive miles of railroad from each of said points complete and in running order within two years after the passage of this act; and to so continue to construct each year thereafter a sufficient number of miles to secure the completion of the whole line from the aforesaid point on the eastern boundary of the State of Texas to the bay of San Diego, in the State of California, as aforesaid, within ten years after the passage of this act; and upon failure to so complete it Congress may adopt such measures as it may deem necessary and proper to secure its speedy completion."

This section applies expressly and only to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company. That company was chartered by Congress. Whether it was a grant in præsenti, upon a condition-subsequent, to be void upon the non-completion of its road within ten years, or was a retention by Congress of a power to take such steps in the use of the lands granted "as it may deem necessary and proper to secure its speedy completion," is a question which your committee do not think it necessary to decide. It is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the language of the twenty-second section which refers in any such manner to the seventeenth section as to demand its incorporation into the twenty-second section, and that the condition-subsequent found at the close of the twenty-second section should be qualified by the words of the last clause of the seventeenth section.

The grant by the twenty-second section was to a corporation chartered by Louisiana; that by the seventeenth section, to one chartered by Congress. Congress had no power, or certainly claimed none, to build the road in Louisiana, provided for by that State's charter. This accounts for the diverse language used in the act at the close of the two sections. Congress could construct the Texas Pacific road, if its chartered company failed to do so. It could not construct the Backbone road if the Backbone Company failed. It could use its own lands to construct the former, it could not do so to construct the latter. Its remedy, in the contingency of the failure of the Texas Pacific Company, was to use the lands granted to do what that company failed to do. Its only remedy as to the Backbone Company was to enter for a breach of the condition, and reinvest its title to the lands granted by the twenty-second section.

The only words in the twenty-second section which place the Backbone Company on the same basis as the Texas Pacific are contained in the clause which gives to the former the same quantity of land as is given to the latter in California, and the clause which provides for the withdrawal, selection, and issue of patents and opening for settlement and pre-emption "upon the same terms and in the same manner and time as is provided for and required from said Texas Pacific Railroad Company within said State of California." These terms, manner, and time are provided for in sections 9, 12, and 18 of the act, and do not relate at all to the contingency of a failure to construct by either company, or to the right of the Government in case of such failure.

There does not seem to be any reason why, if Congress intended to modify the proviso of the twenty-second section by the last words of the seventeenth section, the act should not have so expressly declared, or inserted the terms of the seventeenth at the close of the proviso of the twenty-second section. Not having done so, it does not seem to the committee that any canon of interpretation of statutes either requires or justifies it.

But there is a clause in the twenty-second section which may modify the construction given to the proviso at its close. That clause is as follows:

"And in aid of its construction from New Orleans, &c., * * * there is hereby granted to said company, &c."

And then comes the proviso—

"That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act."

Construing these clauses together, the question may be raised, does this create a technical common-law condition, or does it create a trust coupled with the grant?

In former times this question would not have been permitted. But the disfavor to forfeitures upon breach of conditions-subsequent, in modern times, has given rise to the construction that the grant is charged with a trust rather than affected by a condition.

In the case of Wright vs. Wilken, in the Queen's Bench, and affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber (110 E. C. L. R., 232; Cam. Scacc., 259), it was held that in a will the words "upon express condition" should be construed to import a trust, and not a condition, upon a view of the whole will, as to the real intention of the testator. And the language of Lord St. Leonards in his great work on powers (Sugden on Powers, 122) is cited as high authority for the decision. His lordship's words are these:

"And in regard to its being an estate upon condition, we may observe that what by the old law was deemed a devise upon condition would now perhaps in almost every case be construed a devise in fee upon trust, and by this construction, instead of the heir taking advantage of the condition broken, the cestui que trust can compel an observance of the trust by a suit in equity."

If this modification of the common-law doctrine is now sanctioned in cases of devise, in order to effectuate the intention of the devisor, it might well be contended that a like rule should be applied to grants by the Government for great public purposes, and they be held to be enforceable as trusts binding on the grantee and not as conditions upon breach of which forfeitures will result, without securing the public benefit contemplated in the grant.

But conceding that neither of the alternative interpretations suggested are tenable, they are not without their weight in deciding the questions submitted to the committee, if the proviso in the twenty-second section of the act is construed as a strict condition-subsequent.

It is undeniable that the condition follows the estate into whatever hands it comes. The assignee takes it cum onere. He is bound by and may perform the condition, in like manner as his assignor.

Any one who is interested in a condition, or the estate to which it is attached, may perform it, and when it has once been performed it is thenceforth gone forever. (2 Washburn on Real Property, second edition, page 10; 2 Crabbe, Real Property, 815.)

If the condition be performed in substance it is sufficient. So if it be performed as near the intent of the condition as can be. (Comyn's Dig., Condition, L. 1.)

And conditions are not favored, nor are forfeitures for their breach. (4 Kent's Comm., 128, 129.)

An entry after a breach of the condition avoids the original title conveyed, and revests the title in the grantor, avoiding all intermediate alienations, for the assignees of the original grantee taken subject to the condition. And it was a principle of the common law that no performance of the condition after the day fixed for it could save the forfeiture from the power of the grantor to re-enter. (2 Cruise Dig., title 13, chapter 2, section 10.)

This rule was prevalent three centuries ago, in respect to bonds in a penalty, defeasible on condition-subsequent whether to pay money or perform a collateral act, to mortgages, and to conditions for re-entry for non-payment of rent by lessees and the like. But that rule is now obsolete in a great degree, and the victims of its rigor are now happily unknown, owing to the beneficent intervention of courts of equity and the action of courts of law in accordance with the just rules of those tribunals.

As early as Langford vs. Barnard (Tothill, 134), decided in 37 Elizabeth, the equity of redemption was secured by the chancery court to the mortgagor, whose estate was forfeited at law for non-performance of the condition at the day.

In 1598, about two years after this decision convulsed the kingdom by the fierce conflict between the rude common law and the public conscience, a poet companion of Lord Bacon and the lawyers of that day gave to the world a picture of the controversy in the immortal drama of the Merchant of Venice. The hard, unrelenting, and cruel Shylock, the impersonation of the common law, demanded the pound of flesh as his right by forfeiture for the failure to fulfill the condition-subsequent within the fixed period of performance. In vain his victim tendered performance. It was too late. The day of grace was ended. No after performance could save the forfeited life. Such was the law maintained by judgment of a common-law court.

Portia, the impersonation of the court of equity, which had just asserted redemption as the right of the victim of forfeiture, put in the plea of mercy to temper the rigorous justice of the law. And ever since that day our jurisprudence has, with the poetic justice so wonderfully dramatized by the great master of the human heart, fixed it as a canon of right, that no forfeiture shall be enforced where the performance of the duty secured by a penalty is tendered in full by the victim of the rigid construction of his contract under the rules of the common law.

This principle has been extended to cases of penalties and conditions to do some collateral act other than payment of money; and where such can be compensated in money, when not specifically performed, forfeitures have been relieved against. (See Peachy vs. Somerset, 1 Strange 477; Sloman vs. Walter, 1 Bro. C. C., 413; the leading cases commented on in 3 Wh. and T. L. C. Eq., 862, 895.)

Nor are these mere creatures of equity; for so far has the equity of redemption been upheld that it is now regarded as an estate in land subject to descent, devise, entail, custody, &c. (Casborne vs. Scarpe, 1 Atk., 603.)

But this is not all. Courts of law, taking the lesson which equity and poetry in the Elizabethan period taught it, administers the same relief from penalties and forfeitures for condition broken in many cases, as courts of chancery do.

As early as eighth William III, without statutory aid, the law court, in Downes vs. Turner, cited in Gregg's case (2 Salheld, 597), staid proceedings in ejectment by a lessor, who entered for breach of condition to pay rent, upon payment into court of what was due by the lessee, thus relieving at law from a forfeiture arising from failure to perform the condition at the day. (See also Doe vs. Roe, 4 Taunt., 883.)

Mr. Justice Wilde, in speaking for the court in the cases of Atkins vs. Chilsm (11 Metcalf, 112), and Sanborn vs. Woodman (5 Cush., 36), reviews the English cases on this point, and confirms the doctrine, that a court of law will stay the hand of the grantor who seeks to enforce a forfeiture upon one who tenders in court the performance of an already broken condition.

The legal right, therefore, of one who has incurred a forfeiture by breach of condition-subsequent to relief against an unwilling adversary, upon a substantial performance after the day, at law and in equity, and undoubtedly in the latter forum, can not be denied.

But one other point remains to be considered. After breach of the condition-subsequent, the estate does not determine ipso facto, but only at the election of the grantor by re-entry. And, therefore, if the grantor after such breach accepts performance of the condition tendered by the grantee, he waives the forfeiture, the condition is gone forever, and the estate becomes absolute.

In Dumpor's case (2 Coke, 119; 1 Smith L. C., 15) we find the basis of this principle. In Goodright vs. Davies (Cowper, 803) Lord Mansfield says: "Cases of forfeiture were not favored at law; and where the forfeiture was once waived, the court would not assist it." (See also Ward vs. Day, 116 E. C. & R., 337; Doe vs. Birch, 1 M. & W., 402; Croft vs. Lumley, 85 E. C. & R., 648; S. C. Camm. Scac., ibid., 682; Jackson vs. Barman, 7 Johnson, 227, and other cases cited in note by American editor.)

Ludlow vs. R. R. Co. (12 Barbour, 440) is a case where a railroad company failed to construct road within time prescribed by the plaintiff in a grant of land to it. It proceeded to do so afterward, under the eye and without dissent by grantor. It was held to be a waiver of the forfeiture.

The facts already set forth with sufficient fullness satisfy your committee that the substantial fulfillment of the condition has been met by the assignee company; that it was done under the eye of, and was accepted by the executive department under the provisions of the law of Congress; that all which Congress contemplated in making the grant has been realized, and that it was done by the company on the belief of having secured the grant, a belief based upon the assurance of the Department of the Interior, and upon the official action of the President of the United States in the examination of the work as it progressed, in his sanction of its sufficiency under the law, and in his order for the issue of patents for the land.

After all, this the question is, can—and if it can, ought—Congress to forfeit the land grant to this assignee company? Your committee think both branches of the question must be answered in the negative.

But, more specifically, your committee answer the first question propounded by the memorial in the affirmative; the second under the case stated in this report in the negative; and the third in the negative; though under the view taken in this report that question is immaterial.

All of which is respectfully submitted, with the resolution of the House hereto annexed, and with the said memorial herewith returned:

[H. Res. 232, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 21, 1874.

Read twice, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ellis introduced the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution directing the Judiciary Committees of both Houses to inquire into and report upon certain legal questions involved in the proposed forfeiture of the land grant of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, assigned.

Whereas the Government, by the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871, gave to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company of Louisiana a land grant in the following terms, to wit: "And in aid of its construction from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, thence, by the way of Alexandria, in said State, to connect with the Texas Pacific Railroad Company at its eastern terminus, there is hereby granted to said company, its successors and assigns," &c., the land grant mentioned therein: "Provided, That said company shall complete the whole of said road within five years from the passage of this act;" and

Whereas said grantee did not build said road or any part thereof; and

Whereas said grantee did bargain, sell, convey, and assign all of its right, title, and interest in and to said grant, on the 5th of January, 1881, to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, which company did build and complete said line of railroad "from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and thence, by way of Alexandria, to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad," at Shreveport, in November, 1882, and said road has been surveyed and accepted by the railroad commissioners appointed by the President as built in accordance with the design of Congress, and patents for said land grant were ordered to issue by the President; and

Whereas bills providing for the forfeiture of said grant have been introduced in both Houses of Congress and referred to the Committees on Public Lands; and

Whereas the Public Lands Committee of the House were and are substantially and equally divided on the question of said forfeiture; and

Whereas there are involved in said question grave and serious principles of law, which should be investigated and settled by the law committees of both Houses, in order to enable Congress to arrive at a just and legal settlement of said principles: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Judiciary Committee of each House be required to consider the legal questions involved in the proposed forfeiture of the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, assigned to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, and especially to report within ten days their opinion—

First. If under the language of the grant as cited above from the twenty-second section of the act of March 3, 1871 (sixteenth Statutes, page 579), the said grant was a grant in præsenti with the condition-subsequent, and did it convey a present estate which was susceptible of being alienated, subject to the condition, either before or after breach of condition, but before forfeiture or re-entry by the Government.

Second. Whether if said grant was earned by construction after the breach of condition, but before forfeiture or re-entry by the grantor, any legal right to forfeit remains to the grantor.

Third. Whether the language of the seventeenth section of the act of March 3, 1871 (sixteenth Statutes, page 578), applies to the grant to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad, and does said language, or any part of it, import a waiver of the right to forfeit on the part of the grantor.

I will venture to call the attention of the Senate to the committee that made this report. The gentlemen who concurred in the report were J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia; David B. Culberson, of Texas; Samuel W. Moulton, of Illinois; James O. Broadhead, of Missouri; William Dorsheimer, of New York; Patrick A. Collins, of Massachusetts; George E. Seney, of Ohio; William C. Maybury, of Michigan; Moses A. McCoid, of Iowa; Luke P. Poland, of Vermont; Horatio Bisbee, Jr., of Florida; Abraham X. Parker, of New York, and Edward K. Valentine, of Nebraska. There was a dissenting opinion by two of the members of the committee, Mr. Nathaniel J. Hammond, of Georgia, and Mr. Ezra B. Taylor, of Ohio.

The Secretary of the Interior, as shown by the reports I have read, had in March, 1883, decided that the company were entitled to a patent.

As is customary at the close of an Administration, in its last days all the work is settled that has been investigated and decided. This question having been thoroughly considered by the Department, having been thoroughly considered by the House of Representatives, having been considered by the Senate, having been considered by the Attorney-General, there was nothing further to do, and the Department issued in the first part of March, I think perhaps on the second day of the month, a patent for over 600,000 acres of this land to the company, or to so much thereof, claimed by the company, as was not in dispute between it and either the State of Louisiana or some settler thereon. It was the intention and the purpose of the Department to give this company then, as they ought to have had at least two years before, or nearly two years before, all the land that was not in controversy, reserving for the consideration of the Administration to follow all that was so in dispute.

It is not unknown to the Senate, that there are men in the city of Washington who have been attempting to blackmail this company, who had no interest in the subject, who had no interest in the land, no interest in the stock, no interest in the matter whatever—officious intermeddlers. Everybody understands that such things are done largely in this city for the purpose of compelling parties to pay them something to cease their opposition, and, as a member of the other House publicly declared in a card while a member, they had approached him and offered to cease their objections provided he would advise the company to pay them for the expense and trouble they had been put to. These parties came to the Senate and procured one member of the Senate, and perhaps two from the State of Louisiana, to sign a request to the Secretary of the Interior that he should not issue the patents; that, having waited two whole Congresses, he should wait another Congress and see whether another Congress might not forfeit the title which the House of Representatives and the Senate had both declared they would not forfeit, and which the Judiciary Committee of the House had declared they could not forfeit, and which the Attorney-General had declared they could not forfeit, and which the Supreme Court had in more than half-a-dozen cases declared they could not forfeit.

This protest came to the Interior Department on the very last day of the session. The Interior Department declined to further withhold its action, and I say here now that the Interior Department never had the right to withhold an hour. No department of the Government has a right to refuse to execute the laws because some member of the legislative department shall so request. Neither has it the right to refuse to execute the laws because one branch of the legislative department shall so request. If that was the rule of law any member of Congress might nullify the statutes in existence. If that was the rule of law one House might nullify the statutes then existing. Mr. E. Rockwood Hoar, when Attorney-General of the United States, declared that the Departments had not the right to refuse to execute a law, even upon a resolution passed by the Senate; declared that it was the duty of the Executive Departments of the Government to administer the laws as they find them, and not as they may be made hereafter.

The Department refused to withhold action and gave to this company a patent. Then came in another Administration, hostile politically to the one going out. It came in with promises of reform; it came in with a blaze and a blare of trumpets as to what was to be done in the way of righting the wrongs that had existed under the late Administration; and the first thing that it did was to go with this question to the Secretary of the Interior, for whom I have the greatest respect and the kindest feelings, even amounting to affection, and against whom I would not say a word, and against whom I lay nothing in this matter. A request was made to him to withhold, and he did just what I would have done if I had been in his place; I would have withheld until I could look into the case and see how it stood. That is what he did, and that is all he did.

Subsequently the opponents of this bill, including the Senator who has addressed you, appeared before the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand, and argued the question whether this company was entitled to receive this grant or not. The Secretary of the Interior then, assisted by his able assistant, Mr. Jencks, sat and heard the arguments made, both pro and con. After listening to the debate, Secretary Lamar said, in his report of 1885——

Mr. EUSTIS. In connection with the statement of my appearance before the Secretary of the Interior to argue this question, I desire to state that it was at the invitation of the Secretary of the Interior that I appeared.

Mr. TELLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not mean to have him understand, or anybody understand, that I thought there was any impropriety in his behavior; not the slightest in the world. It was perfectly proper for the Senator, holding his views, to have so appeared. I only mentioned the fact that the Senate might know that all that could be brought out in this case against the claim was certainly brought out if the Senator was there. I did not refer to it by way of criticism. The Secretary said in his report for 1885:

SUSPENSION OF PATENTS TO THE NEW ORLEANS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Prior to the 3d of March, 1885, selections of land had been made by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad along the line of its route, between New Orleans and Shreveport, to the amount of 1,015,993.76 acres: in pursuance of which, on the 3d of March, in obedience to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, patents were issued to the company for 679,287.64 acres.

Unusual assiduity was manifested, apparently having for its purpose the patenting of the whole amount of the selections of the company before the Department should pass under the control of the then incoming Administration.

Protests had been filed against the issuing of the patents. The time allowed by law for the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg

Railroad (under which the New Orleans Pacific claimed as assignee) had expired before any alleged assignment was made to the claimant.

No beginning had been made by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company to build or attempt to build any road in pursuance of the grant by Congress to it.

The Legislature of Louisiana had passed an act forfeiting the charter of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad before the alleged assignment of the grant to the claimant, which act had been declared unconstitutional.

The right of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company to assign its whole grant, which was made by the Government to aid in the construction of a railroad, to another for a cash consideration, with not even the security of a covenant on file on the part of the assignee to use the grant for the purposes for which it had been made, was a question of grave doubt.

The lands selected by the claimant company were alleged to include lands previously granted to the State of Louisiana under the swamp-land act, as well as many homestead and pre-emption claims of actual settlers.

These, with other considerations, impressed it upon me as a duty, on the 10th of March, to issue an order to the officers of the Land Office to suspend the further issue of patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad. That order yet stands unrevoked.

While the considerations suggested were regarded as sufficient to warrant the suspension of the issue of patents till time was afforded for examination, on application on the part of the attorneys for the road to revoke the order, hearing was had, and from the presentation of the case it would seem that the railroad purchased a portion of a line of a railroad already built from New Orleans to White Castle, a distance of 68 miles.

Allow me to say that it has been held in the Department, both by Mr. Kirkwood and by myself, that for that portion of the road the company was not entitled to any land, and the company subsequently filed, I believe, a release, or if it did not actually it did so at least orally:

As to this portion of the road the company waived claim to the land granted. The residue of the road, from White Castle to Shreveport, was built by the company upon the belief of the full validity of their right to the land granted, and without this benefit of the grant the road would not have been built. The Government railroad examiner reports the road substantially built and equipped, and it would not appear to comport with good faith to those who invested their money on the basis of the grant to take advantage of any technical defect, if such exists, in the transfer to the company.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest for the consideration of Congress the propriety of passing an act, curative of defect, if any exists, in the transfer to the New Orleans Pacific Company, and vesting the title, originally granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company from Whitecastle to Shreveport, in the New Orleans Pacific road.

Mr. PLATT. With the permission of the Senator from Colorado, in this connection I wish to get his understanding of the second section of this bill, which reads:

That the title of the United States and of the original grantee to the lands granted by said act of Congress, of March 3, 1871, to said grantee, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, not herein declared forfeited, is relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, &c.

That section proceeds upon the idea that the United States may have some title to these lands. I wish to know what the Senator's understanding of it is, whether the doubt or the cloud upon the title exists in consequence of some technical defect in the transfer, or whether it is an assertion of a doubt that the United States may have a title where the road has been completed though not within the time limited in the original grant, but before any act of forfeiture was declared. Why is the second section necessary?

Mr. TELLER. I am not responsible for the act. It is not mine. It is not before the Senate on any suggestion of mine. I have no further interest in it than anybody else, but I understand it is a legislative recognition of the validity of that patent.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado whether in all the discussions that have taken place in reference to this grant there has been any question raised by anybody to the effect that there was any technical fault or defect in the transfer?

Mr. TELLER. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The only question that has been raised, then, is as to the power of the grantee company to make a transfer that would be good in the hands of the transferee.

Mr. TELLER. There was a question raised at that time, and that is what the Department submitted to the Attorney-General, and that is what the Attorney-General decided by his letter of June 13, 1882.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I inquire, further, whether it is not the fact that this section, as intimated by the Senator from Connecticut, does not suggest some defect somewhere in the title of the grantee company, although the transfer was all regular so far as the grantee company had power to make the transfer, and although the transferee had completed the road prior to any steps for forfeiture.

Mr. PLATT. To make myself plain, I do not wish, by the passage of this bill and its second section, to be in any way committed to the doctrine that the United States has any title to land which has been granted to a railroad company when the road has been completed, though not within the time of the original grant, if completed before an act of forfeiture. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. That is exactly what I supposed.

Mr. TELLER. That is the fact, and that is the theory on which the bill goes; but I did not draught the bill, and, of course, I can not say what the draughtsman of the bill might have intended or what the purpose of it is. It came here to the Senate, went to the Committee on Public Lands, and now comes before us with the approval of that committee. I do not myself think that it is necessary that any bill should pass at all, and if I was administering the affairs of the Interior Department I should not wait for any bill to pass. I understand the rule to be too well settled to admit of controversy, both by the decisions of the courts and by the repeated decisions of the Senate, that when a company has completed its road, whether completed within the time provided for or out of the time, it has a vested right that can not be disturbed either by Congress or by the courts before a re-entry, or what is equivalent to a re-entry, at the common law. I do not understand that to be a question at all, and the only benefit or advantage that I can see to anybody in the world by the passage of this act is that the settlers there will have something authoritative in dealing with the railroad company to compel the company to carry out its contract, which, as I said before, I think it has been willing at all times to carry out, but which, of course, a subsequent directorship or a subsequent control might see fit not to do.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to the action of the Department of the Interior under the present Administration. I desire to call attention to the last report of the Secretary of the Interior on this subject. The Secretary of the Interior in his last report again alludes to this question:

SUSPENSION OF PATENTS TO THE NEW ORLEANS PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

In my last report I remarked at length on the matter of the assignment of its land grant by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, and alluded to the fact that the right to make the transfer was a question of grave doubt.

Prior to my incumbency patents had been issued to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company for 679,287.64 acres. In consideration of protests that had been filed against the issue of these patents, of the allegations that the selections by the company had been granted to the State of Louisiana under the swamp grant, of the homestead and pre-emption claims of actual settlers, and of the doubt relative to the transfer, I issued an order March 10, 1885, still in force, suspending the further issue of patents to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

In giving the reasons in my former report for this action I used the following language:

"Prior to the 3d of March, 1885, selections of land had been made by the New Orleans Pacific Railroad along the line of its route, between New Orleans and Shreveport, to the amount of 1,015,993.76 acres; in pursuance of which, on the 3d of March, in obedience to the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, patents were issued to the company for 679,287.64 acres.

"Unusual assiduity was manifested, apparently having for its purpose the patenting of the whole amount of the selections of the company before the Department should pass under the control of the then incoming administration."

As this remark has been construed into unfavorable criticism of the action of my predecessor in this matter, I desire here to state that I have seen in that action nothing inconsistent with the strictest good faith and honest administration.

A hearing was subsequently had on a motion for the revocation of the order. On full consideration of the subject I had the honor to suggest the propriety of legislative action that would cure any defect that might exist in the transfer alluded to, and that would vest the title granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, from Whitecastle to Shreveport, in the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company.

A bill is pending in Congress, having passed one branch thereof, with the above object in view.

The present Administration have asserted twice, at least, that this company is entitled to this land. The only question between this Administration and the former one is whether or not there is a necessity for further legislation. There is, as I have said, a precedent in this country where years ago an assignment made by the Hannibal and Saint Joe road was held by the Attorney-General to be a proper assignment without legislative approval, and the company assignee received the lands under that assignment. There is one other of the same kind. If a company holding any one of these grants can mortgage its grant and be sold out under its mortgage and the purchaser under the mortgage can take the grant, why can it not voluntarily make the assignment as well as transfer it in the other way? The great Northern Pacific Railroad Company to-day holds its title by virtue of the kind of assignment that I first mentioned by mortgage and purchase under the mortgage sale.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate further to the fact that this bill comes here with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, who, as I say, has given careful and, as I know, personal attention to this matter, with which he is entirely familiar. It comes here with his approval. The claim of this company to this land has had the approval of more examining bodies than the claim of any company that ever received from the Government its title to land, and I do not understand why this company is not entitled to it. If the Department think they can not issue the patent without an act of this kind, then I am in favor of giving it to them, because it is a denial of justice to these parties, if they are entitled to the land, to withhold it. It is not in the interest of the settlers that these titles shall be controverted and questioned. It is to their interest as much as to that of the railroad company that there should be a settlement of this question, that they may know whether they are to have the title or whether they are not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The Senator will suspend. The hour has arrived for the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States, under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. EUSTIS. I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, so that we may proceed with the bill which has been under consideration, and dispose of it.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor on the unfinished business.

Mr. HAWLEY. I feel unwilling to assent to that. The other bill is a bill of very great importance, of more general importance than the pending measure. I have no right perhaps to make any personal matter of it, but I must leave town to-night, and I feel a great interest in the experiment-station bill. If I felt sure the Senate would proceed and finish the consideration of the railroad bill, I would not object, but I am afraid this bill will take the afternoon. I know the habit of such bills.

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not think it will take much time.

Mr. GEORGE. I am willing to yield until the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] closes his speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside informally, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] objects, and that ends the matter.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the bill we have under consideration can be disposed of now in much less time than the time that will be necessary to dispose of it if it shall go over. I am under the impression that both these bills can be disposed of this afternoon. I will say that for the benefit of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EUSTIS. I do not know of any intended discussion.

Mr. HAWLEY. I reserve the right to call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3186) is withdrawn, and that bill continues before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TELLER. I only want to say in conclusion that as to the right of a railroad company grantee to convey its title to an assignee company, the matter was settled by the opinion of Henry Stanberry, who was Attorney-General of the United States some years ago, and whom everybody will recognize as one of the ablest lawyers that was ever in public life, and a very distinguished Democrat. He was the first Attorney-General who made that decision. It was followed subsequently by Mr. Ackerman. Mr. Stanberry, in a very elaborate and carefully-prepared opinion, which I thought I could put my hand on, which was introduced and read here on a former occasion, decided that the grant carried with it the right of assignment. Upon that there has never been any contrariety of opinion; there has never been any question that I know of in public life. It does carry the grant; and therefore this company stands exactly as does any other company to which we have given a patent to land which had completed its road in time.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer amendments to the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The proposed amendments will be read for information, though there is an amendment already pending.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "New Orleans" in line 9 of section 2, and to insert:

Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior, October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road and still remaining in their possession or in possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States.

In section 3 it is proposed to strike out in line 7 the words "fully discharged," and insert in lieu of them the words "agree to discharge." And in section 6, line 5, between the words "of the" and "fourth" to insert "second, third." In section 6, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the words "Blanchard-Robinson agreement," and insert in lieu thereof "section — of this act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. The amendment just read was only read for information.

Mr. EUSTIS. I give notice that in case the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is a substitute for the whole bill. The amendment last offered is one to amend the text of the original bill. Does the Senator fartherest from the Chair desire to press it now?

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, sir; I offered it as an amendment to perfect the bill, to be voted on before the substitute is acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair is obliged to hold that it is first in order.

Mr. GIBSON. The vote on this amendment should be taken before the vote on the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is quite right. The proposition to amend the original bill is first in order.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to state that my colleague has merely anticipated an amendment of which I gave notice. I intended, if my amendment to forfeit the lands had been rejected, then to have offered amendments in order further to protect the rights of settlers under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, this subject has been before Congress for many years, and every aspect of it has been fully presented to the consideration of either House of Congress. I do not propose to detain the Senate at this time by making any elaborate argument, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of the facts. I do not propose to discuss abstract questions of law that might possibly affect this case as if this was a court of law and we were bound by the law only, but I address myself to Senators who will be influenced not by the law merely, the lex scripta, or by technical phases of the transaction which is before us, but by a sense of justice and by those considerations of public policy that properly address themselves to the sovereign power of the Government.

It will be admitted that a grant was made by the Government of the United States on the 3d of March, 1871, to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company, and as the act recites, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railway from New Orleans to the eastern terminus of the Pacific Railroad Company, which was located in Texas.

That the grant was actually made by competent authority to make the grant, and that it was received by a party with the capacity to receive the grant is beyond dispute. That land grant has never been forfeited by the Government of the United States. It is an existing grant to-day so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, for it is a well-established principle that the power making the grant is the only power capable of forfeiting a grant, and so far no act of forfeiture has ever passed the Congress of the United States.

The question arises, then, ought we to forfeit this grant? Assuming for the purposes of argument that we have the capacity to forfeit it, a higher question than that arises. Ought we in good conscience to forfeit this grant? Ought we, listening to the dictates of public policy, to forfeit this grant?

Mr. President, the railroad has been built from New Orleans to the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad. Three hundred and thirty-three miles of track have been laid, and the cars are running on that railway to-day. The high public purpose has been accomplished. It was the aspiration of the statesmanship of this country for many long years to establish a railroad to the Pacific Ocean on the thirty-second line of latitude. I do not enter at this time into those considerations that gave birth to that aspiration, but it has been realized, a high public policy has been accomplished, and we have to-day, I repeat, a railway extending from the city of New Orleans to the Pacific Ocean.

We are told that we ought to forfeit this grant notwithstanding these facts; that at this very day, after the road has been completed, after it has been accepted by the Executive Department of the Government, after the conditions of land-grant railroads have been imposed upon it, after the people have received all the benefits that would arise from the completion of this public policy by this railroad, we ought now to declare it forfeited.

I have before me an address of high Democratic authority upon this subject. It is from the lips of Allen G. Thurman. He says:

I defy anybody to point out one single case in which Congress has forfeited a land grant after the improvement in aid of which that grant was made has been constructed. There is no such case in all the history of this land whatsoever, and there ought not to be.

Why should we forfeit the whole of this grant. It is said, in the first place, that the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company was a fraudulent concern. That may be, sir. I am not here to defend it. That corporation did exist at one time under the authority of law, and at the time that they received this grant it was a legal, existing corporation in the State of Louisiana. The Government of the United States was to determine that question for itself, and it adjudged it to possess the capacity to receive this railroad grant at the time that it made it to it. We are concluded, therefore, so far as the existence of this corporation is concerned, by the act of the Government itself.

It is said that it did not build a foot of this railway within the time prescribed in the granting act. I admit that. The five years elapsed without a single mile of the railroad being built; without any one of the terms or conditions of the grant being fulfilled by the grantee. When I discovered that that was the case I introduced a bill, in the year 1877, in the House of Representatives which I hold before me, declaring that there should be a forfeiture of this land grant as to this delinquent corporation. That bill was reported favorably, at that time, by the Committee on Railways of the House of Representatives.

But what was the object of that forfeiture? The object of that forfeiture was not only to declare that the Backbone Railroad had no right to this grant, but that it should be transferred to another railroad corporation which had been created by the Legislature of Louisiana for the very purpose of building a railroad from New Orleans to Texas.

In introducing that bill I responded to the universal sentiment which prevailed throughout the entire State of Louisiana. The citizens of New Orleans felt that a railway connection with Texas was essential to the restoration of their former prosperity; that they were suffering from a want of connection with the great and prosperous State of Texas; and that if they could secure a railroad through the State of Louisiana to Texas it would be the most efficient means to help them along in the restoration of their commerce and trade.

The Legislature of Louisiana passed an act authorizing the corporation of the city of New Orleans to tax itself $2,000,000 to aid this railway company. Every parish and every municipality through which it should pass was authorized to tax themselves to aid along in this work. The Legislature itself voted the sum of $2,000,000 to aid the corporation in completing the railroad from New Orleans to Texas. One of the parishes on that route, I believe, subscribed $100,000 to accomplish this design, for it was felt at that time to be the most beneficent that could be conceived of.

Nay, sir, petition after petition poured in at that time in favor of the transfer of this land grant to the New Orleans and Pacific Railway. These petitions were signed by the leading citizens of the State, by every commercial body in the city of New Orleans, every insurance company, every bank, every railroad company, all the commercial exchanges. All that there was of intelligence and character and patriotism seemed to be aroused not only in the city of New Orleans but throughout the State of Louisiana, in the supreme effort to require connection with the prosperous country lying to the west of that State.

In order to meet the views of the people, I introduced a bill to forfeit this land grant as to the Backbone Railway Company, and to transfer it to the New Orleans and Pacific. I was sustained by every member of the delegation at that time in this effort in the House of Representatives, but we failed, although the committee on that subject in the House reported in favor of forfeiture and to transfer the land grant to the New Orleans Pacific. We all know how difficult it is in that body to procure action on bills that are reported, and the bill failed for want of consideration, though energetically pressed by Judge Elam, Representative from the fourth district.

The New Orleans Pacific Company, under this state of facts, then applied to the Backbone Railroad Company for a transfer of this land grant, and succeeded finally in securing the land grant. It may be that this transfer may have been irregular. If it was, sir, for one I am willing to make it regular, because I have the power to do so. It was a transfer received by the New Orleans and Pacific Company in good faith. This company stood for the people of the State at that time. It stood in a corporate form representing the true interests and the aspirations of the people, and this land grant was used by that company as the means by which it was enabled to build the road.

Sir, that can not be successfully denied. We have before us the affidavit of the president of the New Orleans and Pacific Railroad Company, a gentleman who stands as well in the city of New Orleans as any other person in its limits, a merchant of respectability who quit his own avocation in order that he might give his time and services to the people of that city for the purpose of aiding them in recovering their lost trade and commerce by dedicating himself to the building of a railroad from New Orleans to Texas. We have his affidavit to this effect. If it stood alone it would be sufficient for me, in the light of the facts that antedate it and that surround it. The affidavit of a single respectable man standing as E. B. Wheelock does in the city of New Orleans and as the representative of this corporation organized under these circumstances is sufficient of itself, if there were no other facts in the case, to lead me to the conviction that this land grant was used, as he declared it was used, for the purpose of building this railroad from New Orleans to Texas.

How otherwise could the road have been built? Where could these citizens of New Orleans have procured the enormous sum of six or seven million dollars with which to build this highway except from the land grant? We have no large capitalists in that city; we have no men who have large means to invest in such a venture as this, and every one of the offerings of the State government and of the city governments and of the parish governments of that State was made imperative, large as they were, on questions that were brought before the courts of the State, and they fell back powerless to be of any assistance in this work of regeneration.

This land grant supplied the deficiency and saved to the people an enterprise that they had stood ready to assist from their own meager resources, but which fortunately escaped the self-imposed burden.

But there is other testimony here to the same effect. I do not know the gentleman, whose name I think is Dodge, who assisted, with Mr. Wheelock, in building this railway, he himself, I believe, the president of a construction company and making a contract with the Central Pacific Company to build this road. He also files his affidavit to that effect. We have before us the whole correspondence with the Executive Department of the Government, showing the caution which this railroad company exhibited, asking what would be the effect of the transfer in the event that it were made from the Backbone Railroad Company to the New Orleans and Pacific, and informed by the executive officers of the Government that it would be valid and binding, and carry the land grant. Here are the letters before me. I shall not tax the patience of the Senate to read them. They are from your own officials of high character in the executive departments of the Government giving to the gentlemen prepared to make this transaction the guarantee and assurance, as far as they could, that if the transfer was made it would be valid and binding.

Sir, I am not here to say whether it was valid and binding or not. That is not essential to any fair view that might be taken of this case. It is wholly extraneous. Nor is it appropriate to ask whether these officers were clothed by law with the power to make this declaration and give this guarantee. It is enough for me to know that these men came up here and received such assurances from the executive departments of the Government, and that on the faith of their assurances thus given publicly, officially, they went to work to build this railroad out of the proceeds of this land grant which had been made to the Backbone Railroad Company.

The road has been built, I repeat, under the good faith of this transaction, and the people of the State of Louisiana and of the whole country have received the benefit of that connection with Texas.

But it is said again that the road is built on the wrong side of the river; that under the charter granted by the State to the Backbone Railroad Company it should have built its road on the eastern side of the river and not on the western side of the river. I admit that a small stem of this road from New Orleans to Baton Rouge under the terms of the grant was required to have been built on the eastern side of the Mississippi River—some 80 miles. All the rest of the road, as every one knows who is acquainted with the country, could not have been built on the east side of the river, but must necessarily have been built on the west side of the Mississippi River.

I admit, Senators, that this would be a cause of forfeiture, but it is not a forfeiture in itself any more than the other cause of forfeiture to which I have referred, because we are not a court declaring what the law is, as applicable to this state of facts, but we are a Senate, representing in part the sovereign power of the Government; and we are able to come in and say whether we think in justice, under these circumstances, we will forfeit or not. That is not, in my judgment, a sufficient cause for forfeiture.

It is said that inasmuch as the railroad was built by the assignee company outside of the limits of time, therefore this grant should be forfeited. I admit that that also is a cause of forfeiture. The law imposed on this grant a proviso which can not be obliterated, that the whole road should be built within five years. That condition, no matter what you may call it, a condition-suspensive or a condition precedent or subsequent, never has been complied with, for the road was built long years after the five years had elapsed.

Therefore, it is a cause of forfeiture; but would it be right under these circumstances to declare the forfeiture of that grant? Did we not sit on this Capitol Hill after the five years had expired, my colleague and myself and nearly every Senator in this room long years after the five years had elapsed, and never raised a voice in favor of a forfeiture? Where was my colleague then that he could not be heard, when he represented the State of Louisiana in this Chamber while I was in the House of Representatives? Why did he not bring in a bill then declaring this forfeiture at that time? It could have been done. No assignment had been made; no one had attempted to build any railroad; and this corrupt Backbone Railroad Company was lying supinely upon its back, incompetent, inadequate to any good purpose.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator desire an answer to his question?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly, if the Senator desires to give one.

Mr. EUSTIS. The reason probably why I did not bring in a bill to declare the forfeiture was that the Legislature of Louisiana had passed a law repealing the charter of the Backbone Railroad Company, and as a lawyer I considered that as a valid repeal.

Mr. GIBSON. I am very glad to give the Senator an opportunity to state the reasons why he did not bring in a bill of forfeiture. But if the action of the State of Louisiana repealing the charter of the Backbone Railroad Company was in itself sufficient to carry the land grant down, to work a forfeiture of that land grant, why is there any necessity to-day to declare a forfeiture by the Government of the United States?

But could the State Legislature, even by repealing the charter of a railway company, take away from it a grant of land or other property which had been granted to it by the Government of the United States? Sir, that is carrying the doctrine of States rights further than I ever heard it carried before. For one, speaking as a Senator, I do not believe that any power was competent to work a forfeiture of a land grant, except the Government of the United States, by which it had been made.

Mr. President, we sat here, as I said, many long years after this delinquent railway company had failed to build the railroad. We are presumed to extend our solicitude over every subject which concerns the welfare of the people, not only of our States but of the United States. We witnessed this transfer from one corporation to another. We saw the assignee begin the work of building the road, we saw it expending its millions on millions to build this railway from the city of New Orleans to the State of Texas, bringing us nearer to the wealth and population of that vast empire. We saw the executive officers of this Government receive the railroad in accordance with the terms of the grant. We saw imposed upon this railroad the obligations that the Government imposes upon a land-grant railway company under the terms of the statute. We saw all this, and not a voice was raised against it, not a warning note, while this transaction of such vast importance, not only to the men engaged in it but to the whole people of the State of Louisiana and to the people of the United States, was proceeding day by day, week by week, and month by month, year by year.

I know that the doctrine of estoppel does not apply to a Government, but it is because a Government is supposed to be actuated by a moral sense which lifts it out of the trammels of courts. For one, I do not believe that it would be right in me, after all these facts which I have related, to attempt now, long years after this whole thing has been completed, to rip it up and to declare a forfeiture.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him as to the date of the facts stated by him? Did the repeal of the Backbone charter by the Louisiana Legislature occur before the assignment by the Backbone company to this new company?

Mr. GIBSON. Certainly, it took place before.

Mr. EUSTIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will give the dates.

Mr. GIBSON. I can give the dates. It took place before any assignment.

Mr. GEORGE. Do you admit that it was a valid repeal of the charter of the Backbone Company, so far as the State was concerned?

Mr. GIBSON. I do not believe, as a matter of law, that it was, but I did not think it necessary to go into that matter, because I am not dealing with that corporation, I am dealing with its assignee and the grant of land subject to the control of the Government of the United States within certain limitations.

Mr. GEORGE. If the charter of the Backbone Railroad Company was validly repealed before it made any assignment of this land to another company, then the grant made by Congress to it necessarily fell from the want of a grantee to hold it, and from the utter incapacity produced by the repeal of the charter of that company to comply with the conditions of the grant.

Mr. EUSTIS. Or to assign the grant.

Mr. GIBSON. But the point I make is that the United States Government regarded that company as competent to receive this grant, and that it is incompetent for anybody else to declare a forfeiture of the grant except the granting power. The effect of this bill is to invoke the assent of the Government to the assignment and to confine the title to the grant in the Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose the grantee dies; suppose it is extinguished.

Mr. GIBSON. That is a question for the Government of the United States to determine, in that case what shall be done with the grant.

Mr. GEORGE. What prevents us from determining it now?

Mr. GIBSON. If you desire an answer to that question I say it did not die at that time. I do not believe that under the jurisprudence of Louisiana that repeal was effectual.

Mr. GEORGE. It was not effectual, of course. All I suggested was the ground, but I make the suggestion on the supposition——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GIBSON. That repeal was tested in the circuit court of the United States, and it was not recognized as valid and legal; it was determined to be null and void—in conflict with the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator to say that he does not recognize the validity of that repeal.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not. Even if I did, I would not draw the deduction from it that the Senator from Mississippi does. Even if the act had been repealed, this property of the corporation would have remained among its assets, and could have been disposed of and confirmed by the Government of the United States, subject to the terms and conditions of the grant. I was arguing the point whether at this time it was proper and right for us to declare a forfeiture of the grant. I am willing to declare a forfeiture of the grant so far as the road was not built, the 80 or 90 miles from New Orleans to White Castle. I understand that the company does not claim the grant coterminus with that portion of the road. My amendment goes to the effect of bringing down the title to these lands to the time when the road was actually built. While the Backbone Railroad Company was delinquent certain people saw very plainly that no road was being built and went on those lands in good faith and settled upon them, and built their homes upon them.

Mr. GEORGE. Do they claim under the railroad company?

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; they claim, according to my amendment, under the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Did they go into settlement under a contract with the railroad company?

Mr. GIBSON. No, sir; but before any railway was built, during the time that the railway companies were doing nothing, and had done nothing, and until the road was actually built. I have a letter addressed to me by a gentleman who was in the House of Representatives—the most active and energetic opponent of this corporation. He would like to have the whole grant forfeited. I refer to the Hon. E. T. Lewis. But he says in his letter to me, speaking in the interest of the settlers:

> The amendment is simply to except from the confirmation contained in section 2 the lands occupied by the settlers up to October 27, 1881, the date of the definite location of the line of the railroad, and to include these lands in the forfeiture contained in section 1. In addition to this another section should be added authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to restore such lands to the public domain, and directing that preference shall be given such settlers to make entry of such lands under the homestead law.

That is the effect of my amendment. It is to except from this grant or to forfeit against the railroad company all the lands that were in the actual occupancy of settlers up to the time of definite location, and after that time the Robertson and Blanchard agreement will prevail. I understand that the Robertson and Blanchard agreement is satisfactory to all parties concerned in this transaction, satisfactory to the settlers, and satisfactory to the railway company. Mr. BLANCHARD has represented his district many long years in the House of Representatives acceptably to the people of his district, and honorable E. W. Robertson, who co-operated with him in making this agreement, has been returned to the next Congress. The people of their district in which these lands are located indorse their conduct.

Sir, the amendment that I offer, therefore, is acceptable, so far as I know, to the people who have gone upon these lands in good faith and made their homesteads upon them. I sympathize with these homesteaders as much as anybody. They are my fellow-citizens. I do not know this railroad corporation as it stands to-day. I have no relations with any railroad company in the United States. I know perhaps less about railroads, I was going to say, and their officials than any gentleman in the Senate Chamber. I have as many reasons for extending my hearty sympathy to the homesteaders upon the lands embraced within this land grant as any man possibly could have. There are ties of every kind between me and them, and so far as my conscience will permit me I am always ready to stretch out my hand in their behalf and to offer any amendments which are consistent with an honest, fair, and upright administration of the Government.

Mr. President, I am addressing myself, I wish to say again, to the Senate. I am for practical results. I take no pride in airing a little law learning before the Senate; I desire to reach practical results. This whole matter has been before the Secretary of the Interior, for whose ability as a lawyer and whose uprightness as a man I have the profoundest respect. He has given a long and patient investigation to the questions involved, and he concludes a review of the whole transaction in these words, addressed to the Congress of the United States:

> The Government railroad examiner reports the road substantially built and equipped, and it would not appear to comport with good faith to those who invested their money on the basis of the grant to take advantage of any technical defect, if such exists, in the transfer to the company.
> I would, therefore, respectfully suggest for the consideration of Congress the propriety of passing an act curative of defect, if any exists, in the transfer to the New Orleans Pacific Company, and vesting the title, originally granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company from White Castle to Shreveport, in the New Orleans Pacific road.

Mr. GEORGE. Whose language is that?

Mr. GIBSON. That is the language of Secretary Lamar in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. Secretary Lamar had examined this whole business from beginning to end, the facts and the law, had given due weight to the argument that the charter of the corporation called the Backbone Railroad Company had been repealed, had given weight to the allegation that the road should have been built on the eastern side of the river, to the allegation that the road as actually built was out of time—to every possible objection to the confirmation of this railroad grant, and in this formal report to Congress he urges us to pass a bill curative of defects, if any exist.

Sir, I admit that they are defects, but I think that good faith, as Secretary Lamar says, and the public policy require that we shall pass a bill curative of the defects which have been pointed out by those who would have the granting act repealed.

I understand that the provisions of this bill are acquiesced in by all the parties to this transaction. Patents have been issued, it is true, for a great many of these lands, some 700,000 acres, and only 300,000 acres yet remain unpatented. I do not know the number of settlers who claim to have their rights on the lands covered by this grant. I understand that they are very few, but if there was but one honest citizen of my State who had acquired a homestead upon this grant while the Backbone Railroad Company was in default, or before the road was built, I should feel that he was entitled to his homestead; and for that reason I have offered my amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. President, I did not intend to speak upon this question, but I desire to notice several statements which have been made by my colleague.

There is one fact that appears very prominently whenever a question is discussed in this body with regard to the forfeiture of a land grant; and that is that Senators are divided into two classes of lawyers, one of them who believe that the Government of the United States and the people of the United States have some rights with reference to property which belonged to them, and others who find that all the law and all the equities of the case are on the side of railroad corporations. For instance, by the votes of this body with reference to land grants there have been evolved what I consider the most extraordinary legal propositions which have ever been countenanced or indorsed by any legislative or legal or judicial body; as, for example, when the Government of the United States makes a grant of land for a specific and defined purpose, coupled with express and explicit conditions, some lawyers argue the question as though no conditions attached to the grant and they were to be considered as not written.

It has been decided by a vote of this body that the question of time, which the grantor certainly had a right to impose, as he was parting with his property upon condition, was a non-essential and a non-existing condition. That has been decided. Another decision has been made that a grant and a condition are divisible; that is to say, if a testator were to make a bequest upon a condition in the testament, the legatee, by partially complying with that condition, can acquire a partial estate under the testament. Another decision has been rendered that when the United States makes a grant to a railroad company in order to construct a railroad between two given points, the railroad company can construct what portion of the road it chooses and leave unconstructed what portion it chooses, and that it acquires the grant under those circumstances.

Mr. President, if I have not been able to subscribe heretofore to these very extraordinary propositions of law, and if I do not propose at the present time or in the future to subscribe to any such, what I consider, legally speaking, monstrous propositions, it is not because I desire to make any display of legal lore, but it is, perhaps, because I have a constitutional defect, that I respect the law as I have studied it, as it has been, is to-day, and ever shall be, and that whenever I am called upon as a United States Senator to adjudicate a contention between the Government of the United States and a railroad corporation, I do not intend to resolve all the doubts against the Government and the people in favor of railroad corporations.

I do not deny that there may be equities with reference to some cases, but the principle I have contended for is the assertion of the power of Congress to defend and to vindicate the rights of the Government and of the people under these railroad grants. It is to subject the arrogance, the overshadowing power, the insolent demands of these railroad corporations to the jurisdictional authority of the Congress of the United States that I maintain the principles which I advocate in this body, and by which I propose to justify the votes that I cast.

I have no fear myself but that the time will come, and it will come shortly, when the grave apprehensions which now disquiet and harass the public mind and disturb the quietude of the people of this country as to the overshadowing influence and authority and power of corporate bodies over the legislation of this country, will be checked, will be diminished, will be subjugated, and will be destroyed, because I have confidence in the integrity, the manhood, and the intelligence of the American people. But I protest that when a proposition is submitted such as I have submitted with reference to this bill, it should be more seriously discussed than it has been, and the real facts of the case should be more clearly presented for the appreciation of this body.

What are the facts? There was in 1869 a corporation created in the State of Louisiana known as the Backbone Railroad Company. The beneficiaries under that act of incorporation were a class of men whom I shall not designate in this body. They were wholly irresponsible adventurers, men whose chief pursuit was to speculate upon the legislation of this country. They never contemplated for an instant of time, never intended, never dreamt of building a single mile of any railroad in the State of Louisiana.

With this act of State incorporation they came to the United States Congress and by an amendment to the Texas Pacific act, a section that was inserted there, and I may say was smuggled into that law, there was conferred upon that corporation a grant of land belonging to the Government and to the people amounting to 1,200,000 acres. Not a day did that corporation seriously live; not a corporate act did it ever perform; it was nothing but a myth, the ghost of a corporation that only appeared for the purpose of exerting the capacity of holding that land grant from the Government of the United States in order to speculate upon it and to sell it in the markets as a land grant.

Was that an honest proceeding? Is such a corporation as that, created as it was, living as it did, entitled to the slightest equitable consideration to-day at the hands of Congress? The Legislature in 1877 repealed that charter, because it was known from one end to the other of the State of Louisiana that it was a sham and a mockery, a disgrace and a stigma upon the legislation of the State of Louisiana. And yet five years after the repeal of that charter that corporation, not giving the remotest symptom of the slightest corporate existence, at a secret meeting in the city of New York, made an assignment of this grant of lands to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company. Then, to the astonishment of the people of Louisiana, to their dismay, this revived and resurrected dead corporation was brought again to the surface.

Now, I appreciate the force and the logic of the position of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who was Secretary of the Interior. He believed, under the former rulings of the Department and under the opinions given by the several Attorneys-General, that that assignment was a legal assignment, that that assignment did transfer the title of this grant from the Backbone Railroad Company to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, and, so believing, he ordered an issue of these patents. While I differ with him upon the question of law entirely, while I dissent wholly from the views which he entertains upon these several questions, yet I admit that from his standpoint that was a consistent and a logical position for him to take. But that is not the theory of this bill, and I was gratified to hear the Senator express himself that there really was no necessity for this bill. That is his position. But this bill proposes to ignore that assignment, and to do what? To make an original grant or donation to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company of these lands.

Mr. President, that was not the original purpose of the grant. The original purpose of the grant was that within five years from 1871 the Backbone Railroad Company or its assigns should build a railroad between the two stated points, and I can scarcely with patience listen to the equities which are urged in favor to-day of conferring an original grant upon the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company in the face of the express declaration made by that railroad company that they did not require that grant in order to construct the road. Here is the dispatch of the president of that road:

> No arrangement looking to any recognition of the pretended claims of the Backbone Company will be entertained by my company. * * * We now have ability to complete our road without Government assistance, and if our friends can not secure land grant we must get along without it.

Is the Congress of the United States, simply because a company builds a road, going to donate for that reason lands to a railroad company? Why discriminate in favor of this railroad company? Is that the object, simply because they have built a railroad, therefore a land grant ought to be given to this railroad company? I, for one, am opposed to that proposition. I do not believe that it is right, that it is just, that it accords with our present views of discharging our duties with reference to these land grants, that we should to-day make a donation and a grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, which was never before a grantee under any law of the United States Government, when that railroad company especially declared that it did not require the land grant in order to complete the road which it proposed to build.

Mr. VEST. May I ask a question?

Mr. EUSTIS. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. Does the constitution of Louisiana authorize the Legislature to repeal a charter, or is there a question as to the effect or the extent of the repealing act? How did the company get rid of the repeal of the charter by the Legislature?

Mr. EUSTIS. They ignored it. The only dispute in court was with reference to the constitutionality of that act.

Mr. GEORGE. The act of repeal?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir. The circuit court of the United States held that it was unconstitutional; but this New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company stated in an authentic document that that was a fictitious case and a fictitious issue, that both parties to the suit had a common interest.

Mr. GEORGE. Interested in having the ruling made that was made?

Mr. EUSTIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Is there any provision in the constitution of Louisiana reserving the power to the Legislature to repeal charters?

Mr. EUSTIS. The general law of Louisiana is that the Legislature has the power to repeal any charter, but where property or money has been invested on the faith of that charter the State has to reimburse it so that the parties shall not suffer. There was a provision in this law declaring that the act of incorporation of the Backbone Railroad was a contract with the State of Louisiana. Of course that amounts to nothing, as all acts of incorporation are contracts. It was not shown in this case that any one had invested any money in this corporation.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a statement which has been made. There seems to be some doubt (and I am not criticizing the Committee on Public Lands) as to why this act is proposed. It has been stated that it may be—and that is a conjectural statement only—that the Secretary of the Interior believes that there is some defect in the assignment itself made by the Backbone Railroad Company to the New Orleans Pacific Company. The Government of the United States has nothing to do with any defects it finds existing in that assignment. If the Backbone Railroad Company has acquired any property at all, it has acquired it from the Government of the United States, and the acquisition of that property by the Backbone Railroad means a divestiture of the title of the Government of the United States in that land grant; and what has the Government of the United States to do with any defect in any ulterior title, or in any subsequent assignment? If the Government of the United States has parted with its title, it cannot be affected in any way by any defect in the issuing of any subsequent title. The Government of the United States is not a warrantor when it makes a land grant. Therefore, I am myself at a loss to understand why this act is proposed, unless it be that there is more than a serious doubt existing in the mind of the executive department of the Government as to the true condition of this land grant, whether it is to-day in the Government of the United States or not, and it is in order to have that question determined that this act is proposed.

The former Secretary of the Interior issued patents to the land for six hundred and seventy-nine thousand acres. The present Secretary of the Interior has not issued a single patent ever since the 4th of March, 1885.

I think that the title exists to-day in the Government of the United States. I believe that that land to-day belongs to the Government of the United States and to the people of the United States, and neither to the Backbone Railroad Company nor to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company; and so believing, I will not under any condition of circumstances vote to make a land grant to a railroad company today when that grant has not been earned and when that company informed Congress and the public that it did not require that land in order to construct that road.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, as some question has been asked as to the status of the Backbone Railroad Company under the repealing act of the Legislature of Louisiana, I should like to read what may be pertinent to that question that which I find in the report of the House Judiciary Committee of May 15, 1884, which report was drawn and submitted by the honorable JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER, a member of the House of Representatives, and chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of that body:

By act of the Legislature of Louisiana approved December 30, 1869, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company was chartered, with a provision that the said company—

"Shall possess and enjoy the rights and franchises granted to said company by the State of Louisiana in this act and heretofore; and such grants and the engagements herein made and entered into on the part of the State of Louisiana shall be deemed to be, and shall be, binding contracts between the State of Louisiana and the said company, not to be impaired, disturbed, or modified by subsequent legislation, except with the consent and on the petition of said company."

In article 447, Code of Louisiana, the general law provides that—

"A corporation legally established may be dissolved:

"1st. By an act of the Legislature, if they deem it necessary or convenient to the public interest; provided that when the act of incorporation imports a contract, on the faith of which individuals have advanced money or engaged their property, it can not be repealed without providing for the reimbursement of the advances made or making full indemnity to such individuals;

"2d. By the forfeiture of their charter, when the corporation abuses its privileges or refuses to accomplish the conditions on which such privileges were granted, in which case the corporation becomes extinct by the effect of the violation of the conditions of the act of incorporation."

Now, says Mr. TUCKER in his report:

This railroad was known as the Backbone Railroad. It was authorized to construct a road, from New Orleans to Shreveport and to Baton Rouge, and intermediate point, upon the east side of the Mississippi River,

By act approved April 30, 1877, the Legislature repealed the said charter (Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 12, 13, Forty-eighth Congress).

The first question presented for consideration is as to the effect of this repealing act. The committee hold it of no effect, because—

1. It was in violation of the terms of the charter, being without the consent and not upon the petition of the company.

2. Bonds had been issued by the company upon money loaned to it; and in the repealing act no provision was made for reimbursement of money, or for indemnity, as required by article 447 of the Code.

On both grounds the repealing act was void and of no effect. And the circuit court of the fifth circuit of Louisiana so decided in the case of Counsellor vs. New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, the record of which may be found in Senate Executive Document No. 31, pages 13-16.

No one will accuse the distinguished representative from Virginia, Mr. RANDOLPH TUCKER, with being in sympathy with corporations in this country and against the rights of the people. Certainly if he by his long public life, and the expressions of his sentiments from time to time in the House of Representatives has not given convincing testimony of the profoundest sympathy for popular rights and popular government, I know of no individual in either body who has.

For myself I have no sympathy with corporate power, but I have a sympathy with doing what is right under all circumstances, whether I am dealing with a corporation or an individual; and I believe that inasmuch as the president of this railroad company and his associates all declare under oath that this railroad was built on the faith of this land grant—and all the attendant circumstances and facts show this to be true—it would be wrong for me to vote to forfeit it as to that railroad company.

I have offered an amendment which will protect every homesteader, which is perfectly satisfactory to the gentleman who represents them most earnestly in the House of Representatives, an amendment drawn in compliance with his request. There is not a man in the State of Louisiana who has earned a right on these lands who will have it invaded or touched under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Is there any grant beyond that line to Baton Rouge?

Mr. GIBSON. It is all beyond it. It is all west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GEORGE. Was the first grant from New Orleans to Baton Rouge?

Mr. GIBSON. From New Orleans to Texas, and all that part coterminous with the road between New Orleans and Baton Rouge is forfeited by the terms of this bill. All that part of the grant coterminous with the road west of the Mississippi River is confined to the railway company, except the lands in the actual occupancy of settlers of the date of the definite location of the road.

This bill has the sanction of the Executive Department of the Government, has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lamar, has passed the House of Representatives without a single vote against it, preserves every right of the settler, is satisfactory, so far as I know, to the railway company, and merits every consideration of public policy and public justice.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I regard this as a very important question, and one which ought not to be determined without very grave consideration.

If the Senate can afford to pass this bill as it came from the other House, it may as well declare that the people of this country have no rights in the public domain, but that it shall be granted hereafter to a few privileged persons upon false pretenses, without any consideration, and simply that they may extort from the people who shall occupy it such price as the condition of its occupancy as may be agreeable to them.

Beyond all doubt there can be no good reason given for passing this bill. The propositions of law upon which it is claimed that this bill can be defended, when presented by the honorable Secretary of the Interior now, or by his predecessor, are without foundation and have no application to this case.

Where will you find an authority for the statement that a corporation living only by the law of a State and declared by that State no longer to be alive, no longer to have the capacity to grant, to contract, or to be contracted with and own property, an artificial being living by the law alone, and the law declaring its life to have been taken away from it, may continue in the performance of its function?

Let us suppose, Mr. President, the extremist construction to be given, that a charter is a contract between the State and the body corporate and unrepealable and sovereign over the people; shall we carry that to this extent, that although the corporate body has not performed its agreed function, the sovereign shall have no control over it whatever; that the only obligation is on the people and none on the corporation? If it be a contract is it not absurd to say that the consideration of performing its corporate franchises according to law shall not be required of it in order that it shall have any existence? Who shall be the judge? Shall the Legislature of Louisiana have no right to institute proceedings for the determination of a franchise given by that State and failed to be used, or improperly used? Is that the law of the Senate? If the Senate holds that to be wise and good law in respect to railroad land grants made by Congress where the people's rights only are taken away, I am sure they will not hold it to be law for any other subject.

We have a grant made by the Congress of the United States on condition that certain parties shall honestly construct a highway in a certain and fixed time. If that grant shall have been given without any obligation on their part to pay any money, to do any labor or anything else, but if it was a mere grant for the purpose of sale it was one that was subject to be avoided, and it is in evidence here that this corporate body never performed a single function during this long time, that it never built any road, that it never possessed any means. Was it still a living body? Had it power? We find that after the solemn inquest of the legislative power of Louisiana it was declared that this body should have no longer corporate life or corporate power, that with full notice of that fact certain parties undertook to obtain from it an assignment of what?

Of an obligation they had assumed to the people of the United States to construct a railroad within a certain period of time and which they had never performed; and after the expiration of its time and after the failure to perform this obligation, and without any pretense whatever that they either intended or had in any way or to any extent performed or sought to perform the condition imposed in the grant from the United States to them, certain parties dealing with this dead corporation in violation of the law of Louisiana, claim to have obtained from it an expired grant, with the privilege of doing what? Of saying to every citizen of the United States, "if you go upon this land you shall do it upon the condition that you, your wife and children, shall have no part of the proceeds of your labor until you have paid to these grantees such consideration and such sum of money for the occupation of this public land of the United States, for which they have given nothing, as they see fit to ask of you." Now we have had many arguments to show that this is all right, that the Supreme Court has declared this to be good law and a wise public policy, but to me they appear utterly unreasonable.

But that is not all. Here is this dead corporate body, here is this expired grant, and here are the assignees in violation of the law of the State of Louisiana and of the solemn declaration of her highest legislative body declaring to the Congress of the United States that they do not recognize this as a valid grant, that they have not proceeded upon the basis of this grant, that they do not claim it, and yet years afterwards, after the construction of this road these parties are here and we have a disposition in the Senate of the United States and in the Congress of the United States to give to men who have built a road without asking any grant from Congress, who have not claimed that they had obtained credit upon it, but who have notified Congress that they did not recognize the right of these assignors nor claim anything from this New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company—we have the Congress of the United States saying now we will recognize and make valid this grant.

I prefer, if this shall be considered and established as a wise public policy, to vote money out of the Treasury of the United States to a railroad company for the honest construction of a railroad, but I am not willing to disguise it by these pretenses. Let us be fair and equitable. Let us not say to the men who shall occupy the lands adjacent to this highway, "You shall build the railroad with your labor as the condition of your occupation and ownership of it; you shall build it out of the labor of your wives and your children, and when you have built it with your hard labor you shall give it to a few individuals with the privilege of taxing you for your productions whatever they may see fit." This is what you propose to do by this bill. You are making a law which shall force the people of the State of Louisiana to pay for a railroad and give it away to a few persons, to be owned by them, with the power of taxing at will the people whom you force to pay for it.

Mr. President, that practice has been followed long enough. This bill and all other bills like this are not intended for the benefit of the people. They are intended to amass great fortunes by taxing the labor of the people of the country, their wives and children, for nothing in the hands of a few individuals; they are intended to build great highways of transportation with the privilege of taxing the whole production of the country at will, and then giving them away after building them with the labor and the money of the people.

It seems to me that there is not one single ground of reason or of law upon which this proposition can be defended. Talk about an assignment from a dead corporation, an assignment of an expired grant with notice that the time had expired, and build up these rights upon fanciful constructions which will meet the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Schulenburg vs. Harriman. The idea of valid grant from a corporation whose franchises have been repealed, with this notice to the future assignee and an assignment of a grant expired by its own terms; and then to claim, after having refused to recognize its validity, that it shall not be forfeited, that it shall not be declared to be the public domain of the United States—five years after the Congress of the United States by the original law had declared this grant should cease to exist with notice to the parties—talk about building a railroad or a highway after the grant had expired in its terms and with notice of the fact!

But, Mr. President, I am led somewhat to take part in this discussion because to-morrow morning I propose to present to the Senate of the United States a resolution asking the Interior Department to take action upon a grant made under somewhat similar circumstances to the State of Florida. I wish to say that I have in my hand here a letter from a citizen of the United States, which I shall then exhibit, with some more extended remarks to the Senate, which illustrates how the people of this country are wronged by the former action of the Interior Department; how they are trampled upon, and how they have failed to have any protection or any recognition of rights under this Government. I have in my hand a letter from a citizen of Florida, a Mr. Stullenfuss, who incloses me a letter from the agent of the Florida Railway and Navigation Company in Florida demanding of him, a settler upon the public land of the United States, antedating through himself and his predecessor the construction of this road, who has built, by the hard labor of himself and his wife and his children, a house, an orange-grove, and a lemon-grove upon his little forty acres of land which he has made valuable by his labor.

Now in his old age that company demands of him $75 an acre for poor, worthless land which he has made valuable only by his labor. I venture to say that I will show to-morrow that although the Interior Department has made a reservation of this land there was never any grant from the State of Florida to this railroad company or its predecessor to build this road, but on the contrary that the Legislature of the State, the governor of the State, and all its public authorities refused to allow them the right to build it, denied their right, and gave it to another corporate body. And yet for years past settlers upon this public land of the United States, invited by the decision of Secretary Chandler and authorized to enter upon it, have been deprived of their homes and the results of their years of labor and their lands sold, or now advertised to be sold, by the agents of this corporation.

Mr. President, the Interior Department has not always examined into the facts of the case and has often erred in its decisions; but that we should, in the light of day, here, now, undertake to declare that a dead corporation, without any sanction of the courts declaring that its act was lawful or how far this corporation should be permitted to exercise rights—that a corporation declared by the legislative power to have no existence, a corporation never having performed any of the acts which it was obligated to do in its charter, never having exercised any of its functions—that a body of this kind could assign, after the expiration of a land grant the term of which had been fixed by the Congress of the United States, a valid right to a new body, and that new body should declare that they did not desire, that they did not recognize, that they did not claim this grant, and then after the road is built that we should turn over the settlers on the public land, the citizens of the United States, to the tender mercies of these people, to demand what they please of them; is to me a most extraordinary proposition, and one which I must condemn, so far as I am concerned, in the strongest terms. If this be law let us have no more of it.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, if this bill shall become a law it will end a controversy which has engaged the attention of both branches of Congress and of the Executive for many years, and which has disturbed the politics and other belongings of the section of country through which this railroad passes for the last five or six years, at least.

I escape the animadversions which the Senator from Louisiana who last spoke [Mr. EUSTIS] casts upon this body by the declaration that I am not a lawyer, and consequently I am not to be classed, although favoring this bill, with those who always find some excuse for favoring the railroad companies as against the United States. I come to the consideration of this question as a layman, caring only that justice shall be done it, and that a full and final settlement may be made as speedily as possible; and there are certain facts, not controverted, which constrain me to accept this bill as the best thing attainable and as a measure which appears to conform to the principles of justice.

I find, in the first place, that the law of this case has been settled with a certain degree of authority, at least, by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, by the Attorney-General of the United States, by the Supreme Court of the United States, by the judgment of a former Secretary of the Interior, and by the equally convincing judgment of the present Secretary of the Interior, to which is added the concurrence of all the parties in interest as to the wisdom, the justice, the propriety of this, and this only, settlement of this controversy.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. EUSTIS. Does the Senator say that this bill is recommended by the present Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PLUMB. I so understand it. A letter to that effect was written by the Secretary of the Interior to the House Committee on Public Lands. I have had a copy of it, and its existence and terms were referred to in debate in the House. The two annual official reports of the present Secretary of the Interior contain substantially a recommendation of the passage of the bill, and its terms and conditions have been recognized by the Department as a fair settlement, by the settlers as a fair settlement, by the railroad company as something it were willing to accept, and therefore the Department has asked that there be put into shape of law that which meets with all these conditions of favor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Kansas allows me to interrupt him long enough to say that I wish to give notice that early to-morrow I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for the consideration of several topics of wide public interest that the Senators all understand

Mr. EUSTIS. Allow me to ask the Senator from Kansas, if it be correct that this grant was acquired by the Backbone Railroad Company, and the Backbone Railroad Company had the power to assign, and did assign, the grant, and that assignment was legal, why is not the title complete in the assignee?

Mr. PLUMB. That is the effect of the decisions which I have cited that the title is complete.

Mr. EUSTIS. Then why pass this act?

Mr. PLUMB. By reason of the complication which has grown up about this matter the Interior Department has expressed an unwillingness to go ahead on the view of the law which it has itself expressed, desiring to use, as it has used, its persuasive powers to procure concessions, which, having secured, it wants put into the shape of law.

The law has been declared, as I have stated, so far as the right of the railroad company is concerned, if the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General are to be believed, and if the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives is to be believed; but for the purpose of Congress making legal that which was before only equitable at least, this bill is considered desirable.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of what is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, but, going on with the consideration of these facts which have been conclusive so far as my action is concerned, I come to the fact that the House of Representatives, two years ago, declined to declare a forfeiture of this land grant, following thereby the decision of its Judiciary Committee—that such forfeiture could not legally be made; that at the last session of the present Congress it unanimously passed this bill, a bill which came from the Public Lands Committee of that House with a unanimous recommendation, and which on a thorough and exhaustive discussion in the House did not have cast against it—one single negative vote. Now we are confronted with the bill in this position and thus fortified.

I am not permitted to doubt the wisdom of the House of Representatives, much less its devotion to public interests; and, judging by this action of the House of Representatives, on the occasions referred to, at first refusing to forfeit, and on the next unanimously passing this bill, I am persuaded to believe that the bill is substantially right and it is this bill or nothing, and that unless the Senate passes this bill the controversy heretofore and now existing will go on, the titles in the section of country through which the road is built will remain unsettled, the improvement of the country will be retarded, and it will drift along in that chaotic condition which has been the characteristic of other matters of a similar character, notably the Des Moines River grant, until, getting worse by lapse of time, it will become harder and harder of settlement.

For the reason, therefore, that this question ought to be settled, for the reason that the House has tendered us that alone which it is willing to agree to as a settlement, for the reason that the settlement which it has tendered to us is recommended most earnestly by the Secretary of the Interior having charge of the administrative portion of this question, both in his annual message and by special letter written the House Committee on the Public Lands earnestly urging the passage of this very bill, I have given my consent to its being reported and shall vote for it. I have been advised also, on what I believe to be good authority, that all that class of people known as settlers living within the limits of the grant are themselves entirely satisfied with this bill and desire that it be passed. I have been told also that it was made the issue in the election of the member of Congress within whose district nineteen-twentieths of all these lands lie, and upon the issue so made Mr. BLANCHARD has been re-elected three successive times with substantial unanimity to the lower House of Congress. I also note that every member of the House from Louisiana favors the passage of this bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. EUSTIS. I desire to state that from the parish of Saint Landry I have received a large number of protests of settlers against the passage of this bill.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say that I have a letter from the parish of Saint Landry from a gentleman who was a Representative in the last Congress from the district in which that parish is located, saying that the amendment which I have offered, and which I think is entirely satisfactory to the Senator from Kansas, is entirely satisfactory to the settlers in that parish.

Mr. PLUMB. I have spoken of the information which has come to me. It may or may not be correct, but it has, so far, not been impeached in substance. That there may be objections to the passage of this bill on the part of persons who have no interest in the subject-matter in controversy, I have no doubt, but I have been advised and believe that those persons who settled within the limits of this grant prior to the definite location of the road and subsequent to that period also are entirely satisfied with the settlement by which they obtain title from the railroad company—a title which this bill confirms.

I favor this bill also because it forfeits and restores to the public domain several hundred thousand acres of public land which but for the passage of this act must continue withdrawn from settlement, thus retarding the growth and development of the country and depriving many people of opportunity for obtaining homes.

If this bill be defeated it will help no settler to a home. The legal status of the land will not be affected thereby. Nor will it better things to declare a forfeiture of lands beyond our power to legally reach. It is of no advantage to the settler to tender to him something which can not lawfully be made permanent to him in the shape of title. It is no advantage to him to be invited to go upon and improve lands for a home upon the idea that they are public lands, if the courts will ultimately decide that they are not public lands and he is to be thereby dispossessed. I am in favor of giving to every man who, with proper, lawful purpose, goes upon the public lands of the United States complete and ample protection, and I would not extend upon any principle or suggestion of equity in this particular case, or in any similar one, the right of the railroad company to one single inch of this soil which it is not legally entitled to upon a strict construction of the granting statute and upon a thorough consideration of all its subsequent acts. But if it is entitled to it under the law I do not believe that it is true friendship to the settlers or to anybody else to attempt to set aside that which the courts will not permit to be done, and invite people to go upon these lands and spend their time and labor there only at some subsequent period to lose all that they have invested and be put out of possession.

Mr. President, it is worth something to have matters of this kind disposed of—to have them finally settled. These lands grow in value each day. It is of great importance to the communities in which these lands lie that they may go upon the tax-rolls and bear their proportion of the burdens of government, be the means of maintaining schools, become the subject of bargain and sale, and that they may be entered upon and improved in security; and where there is no security of title there never will be any improvement.

This controversy has extended over a number of years. It is now in a condition where it can be settled promptly. The House of Representatives has passed this bill with a unanimity which discloses, to my mind, the fact that it will accept nothing else, and I therefore believe that this is the only measure it is possible to pass which will ever settle this much-vexed question.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] has proposed an amendment which I think expresses exactly what the law is to-day. As I understand the law, the railroad company can acquire no right as against the man who has settled upon the land at the date of the definite location of the line. The only exception I should take to the amendment is that it assumes and fixes the date of location, which may or may not be correct. Leaving that out, and saying that whenever the location did take place and was actually made all persons actually living upon the land at that time and who continued in possession, either by themselves or by their heirs or assigns, should be entitled to the land, is a declaration of exactly what I believe the law to be to-day, and there can be no objection to inserting it. It is justice at all events. The bill is better for having it inserted.

Mr. GIBSON. I think it important to make that amendment, because the bill recites that said lands were "located in accordance with the map filed by said New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company in the Department of the Interior." There is a letter from the Interior Department asking that that amendment be made because the line of actual construction does not accord with the map filed by the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, and therefore it is important for the parties that the amendment should be made to the bill. But, if the Senator will permit me, the railroad itself has accepted the line of definite location as the line on which the railroad was built. That very question was submitted to the Interior Department, and I have in my hand the reply of Acting Commissioner, Harrison, dated May 22, 1883, in which the whole matter is discussed at length:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 22, 1883.

SIR: On the 19th March last, the honorable Secretary of the Interior transmitted to this office a copy of his letter of the 13th March to the President, inclosing two reports of Mr. Thomas Hassard, commissioner, on 328 miles of the New Orleans Pacific Railroad in Louisiana, and recommending that said 328 miles of road be accepted, less and inclusive of 68 miles thereof extending from New Orleans to White Castle, and that patents for such lands as may have been earned by the construction be issued to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, with the President's indorsement thereon approving the recommendations.

The honorable Secretary also transmitted two maps showing the line of route of said road as constructed from New Orleans to Shreveport.

One of said maps shows three sections, comprising 130 miles of road, as follows: Sixty miles, extending from a point on the Mississippi River, opposite New Orleans, to a point near Donaldsonville; 20 miles, extending from a point in township 2 north, range 1 east, to a point in township 4 north, range 2 west, and 50 miles extending from the junction with the Texas and Pacific Railway, in Shreveport, La., to a point in township 10 north, range 12 west. This map was filed in the Department October 17, 1881.

The second map, which was filed in the Department November 7, 1882, covers such portions of said road as are not shown upon the first map.

The said maps bear the affidavits of the chief engineer and acting chief engineer, respectively (sworn to October 17, 1881, and November 11, 1882, respectively), to the effect that the sections of road shown thereon have been completed and equipped as required by law, and that the line of route shows the direct location of the road. They also bear your certificate as president of the company, to the effect that the location of the road as represented thereon is correct and has been approved by the company (date or dates of such approval not given), and that the road has been completed and equipped as required by law.

The act of March 3, 1871, twenty-second section, grants to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company (of which the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company is the assignee), its successors and assigns, the same number of alternate sections of public lands per mile in the State of Louisiana as are by said act granted in the State of California to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company. The lands granted by said act in the State of California to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company are ten alternate sections of public land per mile, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, on each side of such line as the company may adopt, where the same shall not have been sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, or to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed.

You will readily observe from the terms of the grant that the date of the definite location of the road is the governing date in the adjustment thereof.

As regards definite location, the usual course is for the railroad company to file, in advance of construction, a map showing the line of route of its road in connection with the lines of the public surveys, with certificates showing that such line has been adopted by the company as the definite location of the line of its road, and the date of such adoption.

The filing in and acceptance of such a map by the Department is generally held to constitute definite location. In the present case no map of definite location was filed in advance of construction.

On the 18th instant, however, the honorable Secretary of the Interior referred to this office, for consideration, your letter of the 8th instant, transmitting a map purporting to show the line of said road as definitely fixed. This map bears the affidavit of the chief engineer of the company, sworn to April 24, 1883, to the effect that the survey and actual location of the line of route of said road from White Castle to Shreveport was made between August, 1875, and December, 1880, and from New Orleans to Westmego during the month of May, 1881. It also bears your sworn certificate, dated May 7, 1883, to the effect that the line of route of said road was located by the chief engineer of the company in conformity with a resolution of the board of directors adopted on the 12th day of August, 1875, as the definite location of the road from White Castle to Shreveport, and from New Orleans to Westmego, and that the dates of the actual location are correctly shown on the map.

You ask that the dates shown on said map be recognized as the dates on which the line of the road was definitely fixed.

In the case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals, decided by the Supreme Court at its October term, 1882, the line of the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad (act July 23, 1866, 14 States., 110) was held to have been definitely fixed when, through the filing with and the acceptance of a map thereof by the Secretary of the Interior, it had ceased to be the subject of change at the will of the company. The Department has generally held that a road is definitely located when the line is so fixed that it can not thereafter be changed in any material particular without the consent of the granting power. (See Copp's L. O., vol. 1, p. 164.)

That portion of the road between New Orleans and Westmego was expressly excluded from the President's acceptance, and, therefore, the date of the definite location of such portion is of no consequence to this office. The portion between White Castle and Shreveport was surveyed and located between August, 1875, and December, 1880.

The assignment of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company was executed January 5, 1881, and the deed of such assignment was filed in this office February 17, 1881.

It can hardly be claimed that the line of the New Orleans Pacific road was at any time between 1875 and 1880 so fixed that it could not have been changed without the consent of the granting power. The company had then no claim to the grant, nor standing before this Department, and could have changed its line at its pleasure.

The first maps showing the location of the road which were filed in the Department were the maps of constructed road, and, as actual construction is the best possible definite location, I am of the opinion that the filing of said maps should be held to be the definite location of the respective sections of road shown thereon.

This office will, therefore, in the adjustment of the grant treat the dates of the filing of said maps (October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882) as the dates of the definite location of the road.

You will be allowed sixty days from the receipt of this letter within which to appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, should you so desire.

Very respectfully,

L. HARRISON,
Acting Commissioner.

E. B. WHEELOCK, Esq.,
President New Orleans Pacific Railway Company, New York City.

My amendment is in entire accord with the letter of the Commissioner and the action of the railroad company itself.

Mr. PLUMB. I was not going to make any objection to that, except, as I thought, by way of suggestion. I am entirely willing that this bill shall be amended, anxious that it shall be amended in every way which gives any suspicion even of actual permanent benefit to any person who can be called a settler; but, as I said before, I do not regard it as a kindness to hold out to men the expectation that they can get what it is beyond our power to obtain.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I should like to know whether the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, thinks that section 2 of this bill is necessary, in his view of the case, in order to vest the title of these lands adjacent to the road that has been completed in the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railway Company.

Mr. PLUMB. Upon that question of law I have simply followed the authority of the Attorney-General and of the Judiciary Committee of the House. My modesty as to my legal attainments does not permit me to dispute such authority. I would therefore say, following that authority, that the second section was not necessary for the purpose of vesting title in anybody, because the title had already vested, but the present Secretary of the Interior in his first annual report recommended the passage of a measure of this kind to cover the question of assignment merely. It has been, as I understand, in deference to his request that that section was adopted; that is to say, that portion which provides for the recognition of the assignment or of the title in the assignee railroad company.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Is that a special recommendation in relation to this case in view of the peculiar facts in this case?

Mr. PLUMB. That was all, and because the question of assignment had been the most troublesome of all the matters in controversy about this grant.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has had much to say about Florida railroad lands in connection with this case. I do not care to go into that, as I know he is able to take care of both sides of it. I only hope that when he gets time he will give some of his good advice to the people of his own State, and that the Legislature which has elected him, and I hope may continue to elect him to the end of time, will be admonished by him of some of the duties which they owe to the people of Florida, and that he will discharge his ammunition at a little closer range if he desires to accomplish results.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Florida Legislature and the people of Florida are very well able to take care of themselves without my assistance or that of my friend from Kansas. The trouble, however, in this matter and in the matter of the Florida railroad grant is that the Interior Department undertakes to act for the Legislature of Florida and the Legislature of Louisiana. It makes grants where they have made none. It recognizes grantees where they have refused to give them power to receive grants. That is the trouble in this case. It is the trouble in the Senate of the United States. No matter what Attorney-General or what committee or what authority have otherwise declared, the Senate of the United States, charged with the protection of the people of this country, and with power to judge for themselves and arrive at correct conclusions, undertake in this case, when the Legislature of Louisiana have declared that a grantee had no authority in law, that it had no equity, that it had no right, to give away the public lands.

The Senate still pursues the lavish and wasteful and oppressive policy which has accumulated vast fortunes in individuals and imposed great poverty on the people. In defiance of the authority of these States, sovereign in that respect at least, we propose by this bill to create these grantees for the purpose of receiving these vast donations. And what are these donations of the public land, whether in Florida or in Louisiana? They are donations of the labor of the men, women, and children. They are donations of their food and clothing. They are attaching a condition to the occupancy of the public lands of the United States in defiance and derogation of its long-established policy of giving these lands to the people.

They established a condition that the right of occupation and cultivation of the soil by the people shall be subject to the authority and the permission of a few individuals at such exactions and prices as they see fit to demand, not for the purpose of constructing a highway, that can not be insisted here; not for any public policy, good or bad—that can not be pretended here; but because the road has been built, by the acknowledgment in advance of the parties to whom this bill gives it, without the faith and credit of these lands, if the facts are as stated by the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. EUSTIS. I read a dispatch from the president of the company. I know nothing about the facts myself.

Mr. CALL. If that be so, certainly we have the authority of the president of the road in the inception of the life of this corporate body that they did not recognize the pretended rights of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad corporation, and that they had the means to build the road without it. Therefore you can not say that the confirmation of this grant is for that purpose.

How idle it is for Senators to talk so much about the completion of a railroad. What right to lands grows up because of the completion of a railroad? What right under the grant grows up? What connection is there in these ideas? There is none whatever; there can be none. The completion of a road to give a right must be in pursuance of a grant, of a public policy, according to the conditions of the grant. It must be within its terms or its purposes in good faith and according to its conditions. Then it confers a right; but to say that the mere fact of the completion of a road without these antecedent circumstances and conditions required by the act of Congress confers any right or alters the proposition is only blinding and confusing the question. It is like all these arguments on the land-grant question—mere assertion without any foundation in reason. It is a revolutionary doctrine, and is rapidly overturning our Government and changing it into an aristocratic form of government.

By this grant and all such grants, Congress declared that a grant of land should be made through an unoccupied country when there was no population and no production. The object was to encourage production and population; Congress fixed the time in which that should be done in order that the railroad might develop that new country. The grantee, therefore, must comply with that condition, which is to build a road, not in the next century, nor in fifty years, but in ten years, in the time fixed by the law, in order that they might develop the new country and carry population there and increase production. The objection to this grant is that they failed to do it; that they waited until other roads, and other capital, and other instrumentalities had developed the country, and then they came in to derive a vastly increased price for this land which had been made valuable by the labor of these people.

Therefore, Mr. President, for one, while if the Senators from Louisiana want to vote a reasonable part of the public domain to the construction of necessary railways in proper localities I am not unwilling to do it, though I think in general such grants had much better not be made; yet I am not willing to continue these enormous grants of a continent which have been made under false pretenses and false constructions of law, which have been supported and made simply to enrich in marvelous and gigantic proportions a few individuals with the hard earnings of the people who, with continuous labor and in want and discomfort, extract from the soil a scanty support.

If Senators think proper to use their office here to impose these burdens on the people as the condition of occupying the land which the Government has given to them, I shall not be one of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in section 2, after the words "New Orleans," in line 9, down to and including the word "railroad," in line 12, as follows:

Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company in the Department of the Interior, which indicates the established line of said railroad.

And to insert:

Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior, October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road and still remaining in their possession, or in the possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public land laws of the United States.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 7; not a quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum voting, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will it be in order to ask that the amendment be printed? I could not hear it, and I think members of the Senate generally have not understood it distinctly; and pending the printing of the amendment, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I submitted my motion before the Senator's call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the motion of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MCMILLAN. That the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No order can be taken, except to adjourn, until a quorum is ascertained to be present.

Mr. BROWN. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appearing that there is no quorum present, it is the duty of the Chair, under the rule, to direct that the roll of the Senate be called. The roll will be called. The amendment will be again read for information.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let the roll be called.

Mr. HARRIS. By unanimous consent we might take the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment and test the presence of a quorum in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. They have been called for.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not hear him. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. It has been requested that this amendment, which I understand transfers from one road to another all the provisions of the bill simply by an amendment, be printed, to be before the body for consideration to-morrow. I do not like to vote for or against a proposition which by mere amendment transfers one subject-matter to another.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will direct the order for printing to be entered, a quorum not being present.

Mr. EUSTIS. What is the effect of an order to print if we go on and vote upon the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposes it will not prevent the Senate from passing on the amendment, notwithstanding the order to print.

Mr. EUSTIS. What is the object of printing the amendment if we are to adopt it now?

Mr. McMILLAN. If the amendment is to be printed, I shall then ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That is the object of my request.

Mr. EUSTIS. I was expecting that; but I suggest to the Senator that it would be better to dispose of this bill to-day. I think it will take but a few minutes to pass the bill now; whereas if it goes over to come up again it may consume another day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that no business can proceed until it is ascertained that a quorum is present. That can be ascertained by a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps there is no desire to take a yea-and-nay vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fact that there is not a quorum present is disclosed.

Mr. TELLER. Let the roll of the Senate be called, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will be a call of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. We had better adjourn, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Berry,	Eustis,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Brown,	Frye,	Mitchell of Oregon,	Spooner,
Butler,	George,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Stanford,
Call,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Teller,
Chace,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Cheney,	Hampton,	Palmer,	Walthall,
Colquitt,	Harris,	Payne,	Whitthorne,
Conger,	Hawley,	Platt,	Williams,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Dolph,	McMillan,	Sabin,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the pending amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the amendment pending be printed. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. McMILLAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that the Senators who are managing this bill are agreed that the pending amendment is all right, and if so, why not dispose of the bill at once?

Mr. GIBSON. There is no objection to the amendment at all.

Mr. CULLOM. Then let us get rid of the bill so as to get at something else.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know that the managers of the bill can bind the other members of the Senate. I do not propose to submit to any arrangement of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLUMB. I trust that motion will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Minnesota.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state that, so far as I have had any chance to confer with the members of the Committee on Public Lands, there is no objection whatever to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the first amendment proposed?

Mr. PLUMB. It is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana will be again read.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the bill and the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the words "New Orleans," in line 9 of section 2, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "railroad," in line 12, as follows:

Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company in the Department of the Interior, which indicates the established line of said railroad.

And to insert:

Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior, October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road and still remaining in their possession, or in the possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public land laws of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Now read the section as it will stand if amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. So as to read:

That the title of the United States and of the original grantee to the lands granted by said act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to said grantee, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, not herein declared forfeited, is relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, said lands to be located in accordance with the map filed by said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road, and still remaining in their possession or in the possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public land laws of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This amendment is a land grant, and nothing else, to the alleged successor of the old grantee, of all that part of the lands which have not been described as being declared forfeited—a land grant that, according to my present information (subject to change when I am convinced), the company never earned within the just interpretation of the law. It is, besides that, the whole thing being illegal so far as I believe now, a limitation upon all the rights of settlers to the date when some ancient location, not dated but described, was filed, and all of the settlers, acting upon their legal rights since, supposing them to have been illegal before the grant, are to be left out in the cold. Therefore, I am against it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Vermont is neither familiar with the bill nor with the facts. The trouble with him is that he does not know what the facts connected with this case are, neither does he understand the pending amendment.

The company claimed originally that the definite location was long anterior to the time fixed by the Department. The amendment of the Senator from Louisiana fixes the definite location just exactly as the Department fixed it, contrary to what the railroad company said. If it is in the interest of anybody it is in the interest of the settlers and not of the railroad company. The railroad company ultimately accepted the decision of the Department as finally fixing the line of definite location, with the dates fixed in the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Supposing that to be so, first, that I do not understand the bill or the subject; and, second, supposing what my friend from Colorado has said as to the time when the amendment proposes to fix the definite location, and from that time forward to cut off the rights of the settlers—supposing that all to be true, the time at which this amendment proposes to cut off the rights of the settlers is a time long since past. If this whole thing, without this proposed act of Congress, is absolutely void, as I believe it is, with great respect to my friend from Colorado, then every settler who, since the date fixed by the amendment has, according to his legal right, gone upon that public land, is to be cut out. So I say again, I am not for it.

Mr. TELLER. As to the time fixed for the definite location, it was unlike any other railroad in this country when the railroad was built. The Senator has voted here again and again against the forfeiting of land grants to railroad companies when they had built their road out of time, when the settlers' rights were determined years before they built their road. Under this provision in this case no settler's rights are touched until after the road was completed. That is the time when the Department said the line was definitely located. "The defects in your map," they said, "are of such a character that you can not go back anterior to the time when you built the road."

The Senator says he has not any doubt but what this is an illegal transaction. He has not looked at it. It is on all fours with every case that has gone to the Supreme Court. It is on all fours with innumerable cases in which the Department have without a question from anybody in the world granted patents year after year for a great many years, ever since the decision in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, fifteen years ago at least.

I do not know upon what ground the Senator bases his statement that this is an illegal transaction. It has had the approval of the Supreme Court, not eo nomine, but in principle. It has had the approval of the House of Representatives, of the Judiciary Committee of the House, and of the Attorney-General of the United States. It has had the approval of this body on at least two occasions, and their title was good.

I said when I made some remarks this afternoon that in my judgment no law was necessary to give them full and complete title. They have it without this measure; but it does give to the settler something that is not given to him under the ordinary law. It will settle the question whether the settler can take, under the Robinson agreement, or whether he can not, if the railroad should see fit to fly from its contract. In that view of the case the settler may get something. It gives to the railroad company nothing in the world but what the law would give them without this legislation.

If the Senator will point out any single feature of this case that differs from the other cases for which he has voted and addressed the Senate on from time to time in favor of sustaining the decision of the Supreme Court, I shall be ready to answer him; I am ready to discuss it with him; but the Senator rises here and says, when he knows nothing about this case at all, that in his judgment it is an illegal transaction; and this act is a confirmation, he says, of land not belonging to this railroad company. It is not a confirmation at all; it is but a declaration that under the law they have the title.

It is not necessary, I repeat, in my judgment, that they should have any declaration of this kind. The unbroken line of decision gives it to them. The Senator can not make any distinction between this case and the Northern Pacific case, where they had not completed their road, save and except that this company completed it before the Northern Pacific did. If there are any equities at all, they are in favor of this company and not of the other. I recollect very well that when that question was here, as a lawyer the Senator took his position that the company having built before there was a re-entry by the Government, by all the canons of the law, by the Supreme Court decision, they could not be interfered with or disturbed. He will not say differently now as a lawyer. He will admit that that is the fact now; and he can not point to a single thing that has ever been done in this case that has not been done in the case of the Northern Pacific and other cases of the same kind which have met his approval on this floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I am to take the opinion of my friend from Colorado, that I do not know anything about this business, then, of course, I should be silent; but, with great respect to him, I can not take it. I think I do know something about this business. I believe I have read the elaborate and exhaustive, and I can not say conclusive, opinion of the Department of the Interior at a time heretofore. Whether my friend was then Secretary of the Interior I do not remember, but somebody was; and I will state to him, and to everybody else, that the difference to my mind (not knowing about it, as he says) between the North Pacific instance and this is a very wide and obvious one. In the matter of the North Pacific Railroad it was a mere question of the lapse of the time which Congress had provided within which they should complete certain sections or all the sections of their line. It was the same corporation, the same enterprise, and over precisely the same line of ground.

Mr. TELLER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it was not over the same line of ground. There was a very material variation in their line of ground, more than there is in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that were so, being as ignorant then as I am now, and perhaps more so, I did not know it, and I will state at present that I do not believe it—not that I doubt my friend's opinion, but that I do not think he is right in his views, in substance.

As I remember this Backbone business (which has backbone enough to get through the House of Representatives and possibly here), it was the case of a grant to a corporation over a certain defined section of country that for years and years beyond the time limited for the building and completion of that road they never did anything about it at all of any substantial value, if they pretended to do anything. I do not remember the details.

Mr. EUSTIS. They never did anything at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They never did anything at all. I thought I was right about that; but under such sharp critics I want to be a little careful and tender-footed in my statements.

By and by and after this dead and buried and almost forgotten grant had gone by, and people had come in and settled one way and another, or had not, no matter what for this purpose, there came another enterprise that wanted to build a railroad in another place with other objects in view, parallel——

Mr. EUSTIS. On the other side of the river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the other side of the Mississippi River. I do not go into detail because I should be picked up undoubtedly as to definite information, as to whether in one section or another section, in the course of this performance. A totally different contrivance, a totally different concern, for in most respects totally different objects, proceeded to get a charter from somebody in some State or somewhere to build a railroad; and then hunting around, as hungry people do sometimes, to see what kind of bones they can pick up, which are good if they can make them boil and do not cost anything if they can not, they bought up this dead and long since defunct and forgotten franchise, grant, charter, right, whatever you call it. Then they proceeded to build their road over their line, and then by an assignment under this purchase they chose to claim that they had got the land of the United States, the land on which settlers had settled, and so on, and that they were entitled to expel these settlers and have this grant recognized by the administrative department of the Government as one lawful and which entitled them to have it.

I think, speaking with great respect, that it was the most audacious steal that I ever heard of in the United States, and that is saying a good deal. But they got a certain advantage in the Departments, or a certain recognition. However, it was found or suspected (and this bill is the consequence of it) that the Department law would not hold against the statutes of the United States and against a judicial investigation, and hence this bill.

Now, as to the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana, which helps it somewhat, the effect of that amendment is to grant, confirm to these people all of a certain part of these lands—I do not care if it is only an acre, I am not for giving them that acre—something that is valuable, something that is worth fighting for, something that is worth lobbying for; and this bill has reached a stage where under that state of things it has got through one House and is now asked to go through another. I am opposed to it.

To come back to the settler again, I respectfully submit that if you are to do it at all under this state of things, as I understand it, imperfectly as I do, and wrongly as I do I will assume, but as I understand it, which is enough for my vote—you are going to sqeeze out every settler who has come in, having a right to come in under the law as it now stands, until this bill passes, since the date that is named in the amendment. Is that right? It is right if the law has given to the present railroad corporation what it claims; it is not right if the law has not given it to it; because the railroad company, I admit, like everybody else is entitled to its legal rights, and if it has got a legal right to the disadvantage of the settler that is the misfortune of the settler. We must take care of him in some other way if we are to do anything at all about it. But if the railroad has not got a legal right, and therefore is compelled, as it now is, to ask Congress to fortify it and confirm it, then I say it is a gross outrage upon the settler and upon all other public interests to turn him out down to this day, and put in the grant to this railroad corporation.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Vermont has had his opportunity now to draw a distinction——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has been recognized. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not yield for the present. I do not think the Senator from Colorado is in good humor now. I am; and I believe I will go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the railroad company to which this grant was first made took its grant under the same terms that were applied in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman and the various cases which have succeeded that. They therefore took a vested right in the property which the United States had the right to divest by a declaration of forfeiture. That was the situation of the Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company. That was the status of that railroad company.

That road was chartered from New Orleans to Baton Rouge, and then on up to Vicksburg on the east side of the Mississippi River. About the same time another road was chartered on the other side of the Mississippi River, also touching at Baton Rouge. The road I first mentioned that was to go up on the east side had also the right to cross the river at Baton Rouge, and to go on to Shreveport. Whether you call it a branch road or not it makes no difference, but there was a bifurcation in the route there according to its charter privileges, so that it might take one or both sides of the river at a pretty sharp angle in going out to Shreveport. That company did not do any work. It had an organization, it issued its stock and received some subscriptions and probably some payments of money into the treasury, or possibly not, but it did not do any work.

Then came along the Louisiana Pacific Railroad, I call it—that which runs up on the west side of the Mississippi River by White Castle to Baton Rouge, and from thence to Shreveport. That road was built. It was built before any proceeding of forfeiture was commenced in this case. Before the United States claimed a forfeiture at all that road was entirely completed from Shreveport to Baton Rouge. That road was alleged to have been built, and I have no doubt it was built, largely upon the consideration of a transfer of the grant made by the road that ran up on the east side of the river of its right in the public domain.

The question arose right there in my mind—this thing has been before the Committee on Public Lands for years—whether or not one of these railroad corporations could bodily transfer its grant into the hands of another railroad corporation. My opinion has been all the time that it could not do that thing, but that where the legitimate object of the original grant was accomplished by a different railroad company it rested in Congress to consent to the transfer if it chose to do so, and that no harm could be done to the country by Congress giving that consent, for the reason that the road which was in the contemplation of Congress at the time the original grant was made had been built by a railroad company and upon the very same line.

I made that point and I suppose I defeated an arrangement that was proposed for the accommodation of this whole question upon that point. Following that the delegation from Louisiana in both Houses—I think it was the Forty-seventh Congress; I am sure it was—got together and after various speeches had been made, and after Mr. TUCKER'S opinion had been delivered in the House of Representatives upon the question of the right to forfeit a railroad grant after the road had been completed, the delegation from Louisiana, then in the Senate and House, came to an agreement about the matter, and the House bill to forfeit the grant was voted down under the influence of the opinion of the Judiciary Committee.

Then, when the matter came at the next session of Congress before the Committee on Public Lands, it was referred to me for consideration. I draughted the bill upon which this bill has evidently been modeled. I reported it back to the Senate, the members of the Senate at that time and also the members of the House from Louisiana having agreed among themselves that that was after all the very best disposition that could be made of the subject.

In order to get that disposition into shape, what did we have to do? Declare a forfeiture of all the land between Baton Rouge and New Orleans on the east side of the river, a forfeiture of all the land hitherto granted by the United States, if there were any granted, from White Castle to New Orleans, and ratify and confirm the grant that had been made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company in favor of the new corporation, the Louisiana Pacific Railroad Company, which, as I have stated, upon the assignment that had been made to it, built the road upon the very line that it was originally designed to pass upon.

That being the state of facts, here was the opinion of the Attorney-General, here was the opinion also of the Interior Department, and not barely its opinion, but action taken from time to time in the issue of patents to this railroad company, that branch of the Government, the executive branch with full judicial power, had made a decision of this question and had proceeded to execute it by the issue of patents. What then remained for Congress to do? Nothing but to execute the agreement, the consent which had been entered into between the members of the different Houses on either side. Of course, that bound nobody, but it was a rational settlement, a reasonable arrangement. Hence it is that this bill has its peculiar features.

In order to remove the objection that I made first against the power of one corporation bodily to transfer its grant into the hands of another, Congress makes the grant operate in favor of the present road, the Louisiana Pacific road, just precisely as if it had been the original party mentioned in the act. I further took the ground that that could not be done without the consent of the company and without its consenting to those obligations which these land-grant roads must put themselves under as a part of the terms of the grant. Hence that feature in the bill which requires that before this law shall take effect the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company shall file its consent in the Department of the Interior accepting these terms with all the engagements and obligations that were imposed in the original grant upon the company from New Orleans by Baton Rouge to Vicksburg, and from New Orleans by Baton Rouge also to Shreveport. That company, therefore, is required to file its consent and its acceptance of all the duties and obligations imposed in that charter.

The next consideration was for the settlers—what were their rights as determined by the Interior Department, as determined in the case I have just quoted of Schulenberg vs. Harriman? What were their rights? They had not any rights at all to the odd-numbered sections of land within the railroad grant. The lands had not been exposed to market; they could not be entered; they could not be bought from the Government of the United States. Nevertheless this railroad company had entered into an agreement, which is found in the records of Congress and to which this bill relates by terms, called the Blanchard-Robinson agreement. They had entered into an agreement in favor of the settlers, that they were to buy the land from the railroad company at the price of two and a half dollars an acre, as I remember, that being the price fixed by the Government of the United States on the sale of land within the limits of a railroad grant, and recognizing the rights of these persons to buy the land upon which they had settled at that price. So it says in this bill that the object of the bill is to carry into effect, ratify, and confirm the Blanchard agreement; but the bill superadds to that the provision that these settlers shall have the right of homestead settlement upon these lands down to the point of time, not when the map of final location was made, but down to the point of time when this railroad was actually completed. That enlarges the rights of the settlers very much, and that was one of the terms, I have no doubt, that brought the Representatives in the other House and the Senators from Louisiana to an agreement about this matter, for, after all, the great debate on the question was, of course, as to what should be done with the settlers. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] proposes, as I understand, still further to enlarge by his amendment the rights of the settlers. He thinks, perhaps, we had cut them a little too close in the form of this bill, and I have no objection to his amendment, nor do I hear of any other member of the Committee on Public Lands who objects to it.

That is the case. I shall not debate it or argue it further than just to say this: We can refuse to pass any bill and invite in another class of lawyers not mentioned by my honorable friend on my right [Mr. EUSTIS], that is, those lawyers who are all the time hunting up cases to fill the dockets of the courts with litigation, and you will have a batch of them, you will have a great harvest of litigation in Louisiana. Refuse to pass this bill, to compose this difficulty according to the agreement, the honorable agreement of members of both Houses as reported to us, and by which our action was largely shaped, and you turn loose bedlam in Louisiana for the lawyers. They will make a good deal out it. I am one of them myself, and like them, but I do not like them to speculate on the misfortunes of the people, and above all things I do not like them to have an opportunity to speculate on the negligence or the indifference of Congress to its public duty.

Mr. EUSTIS. Allow me to suggest that under my amendment the title of every settler who has purchased from this corporation is confirmed, so that there can be no litigation so far as those settlers are concerned.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not see how the Senator from Louisiana can consent for a moment to offer an amendment to a bill which he thinks is founded in fraud, based upon iniquity, which cures nothing in the world of the corruption that he insists existed in this transaction from the beginning, and which, as I understood his argument, ought to be overturned entirely for the mere corruptness of the thing. There may be a great deal of corruption about the bill. I am inclined to look at things in that light from certain quarters of this country that there may be corrupt interference with general public national laws and State laws, too; but when you come to the power of this tribunal to compose difficulties and stop litigation and to settle the people in their rights of homestead, we have got to take a broader view of the matter and look at it in the light of the decisions of our Supreme Court and the policy advocated by the different Departments of this Government.

Here are two Secretaries, following each other, the honorable Senator who had the floor a few moments ago [Mr. TELLER], and Mr. Lamar, both recommending the adoption of this as a settlement of the question. I consider that that ought to have a good deal of weight with the Senate. The House of Representatives, as has been remarked by my friend, the chairman of the committee, has passed the bill unanimously. It was reported in the Senate from this committee long before the other House took it up; a year ago it was reported here. The House took the bill, modeled it upon the very plan that we suggested, and that was the result of this universal understanding; and the House passed the bill unanimously and sends it to us. I can not conceive that this bill gives rise at all to any fair opportunity of criticising gentlemen who have been connected with its passage or its recommendation upon the ground that they belong to a class of lawyers who favor railroad grants. I have not seen any lawyers of that kind in this body, except those lawyers who are influenced by a sincere respect for the law and for justice, and those lawyers who have got the manhood and the courage, for it requires a little of both nowadays, to give to a railroad company its exact rights under the Constitution and laws of this land.

I had the honor to submit a report to this body in which I wholly dissented from the idea of this having been a valid transfer from one corporation to another, and I insisted then that if the bill forfeiting the land, which the House of Representatives voted down as I have already stated, should pass this body it should be accompanied with a requirement on the part of the Attorney-General of the United States that he should go into court and file a bill to compose all of these difficulties, and let one suit decide the whole question.

That has been always my insistance in regard to this matter and will be as long as I have an opportunity, because in doing so I think I can keep down an enormous growth of litigation in regard to these matters. I believe the best thing the Senate can do is to pass this bill and compose these difficulties, and we overcome in this bill the only legal difficulty there ever was in it, which Congress has a perfect right to overcome, by consenting now that that grant shall operate in favor of this railroad company just as it operated in favor of the original railroad company before the transfer was made. I have been informed that gentlemen have put up their money upon this transfer, and it has cost some individuals $150,000 in money to get the arrangement made.

I do not know whether that is so or not, but that information has come to me. If, however, there was not a dollar of consideration paid for it, the purpose of the law in making the original grant has been accomplished in the building of that railroad, and the people have got the benefit of it; and whether it has been executed in literal compliance with the terms of the statute or not, the grand, equitable project which Congress intended to execute in the granting of this charter in the first instance has been accomplished, and I am satisfied.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who could draw a very wide distinction between this case and that of the Northern Pacific, drew the very great distinction that there was a longer time between the period this company received its charter and the time the Northern Pacific Company received its charter. There he is in error on a question of fact. If a longer time had elapsed, will any lawyer say it makes any difference whether the time is two years or one year, provided there has been no re-entry? The fact is that this case is on all fours with all other cases which have been sustained by the Senate and by the courts. There is no difference.

Any intimation that there has been anything improper in the Department in connection with it is a gratuity on the part of the Senator from Vermont. The Secretary of the Interior found himself with an opinion of an Attorney-General that under the law and under his oath he was bound to accept as an adjudication between that company and the Government of the United States. Such was the unbroken line of decisions as to the character of an Attorney-General's opinion, unless the Executive himself should override it. The Executive, however, approved the finding of the Attorney-General instead of disapproving of it.

The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], says he does not think a legal transfer could be made. The Secretary of the Interior not only had the decision of the Attorney-General, who was his associate in the Cabinet, but he had the opinion, as I stated before, of Mr. Stanberry, of Ohio, and I do not believe there is a man in public life to-day who will not admit that Mr. Stanberry seldom had his peer in the history of lawyers in this country.

Every acre of the great grant given to the Hannibal and Saint Joe Railroad is held to-day under a title derived exactly as this was derived; every acre of the 47,000,000 acres now claimed by the Northern Pacific is held by virtue of an assignment that does not differ in law from this assignment, an assignment through a mortgage. This is an assignment direct.

Will any lawyer stand here and tell me and tell the country and stultify himself by saying that he who can assign by a mortgage may not assign by direct proceeding, that he who can put the title out of himself by mortgage can not put it out by a direct sale? As a question of law nobody will dispute it. When the Senator from Vermont says there is any difference between this case and the case of the Northern Pacific Company I repeat it here on the floor of the Senate, with a knowledge of this case and a knowledge of the Northern Pacific history, and I will not yield to him or any other man, that the facts will not support him in the assertion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. TELLER. I think that call might as well be withdrawn.

Mr. GIBSON. I withdraw the call now.

Mr. TELLER. There seems to be no opposition to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be unanimous consent the call may be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in section 3, line 7, after the word "and," to strike out the words "fully discharged" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "agreed to discharge;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the relinquishment of the lands and the confirmation of the grant provided for in the second section of this act are made and shall take effect whenever the Secretary of the Interior is notified that said New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, through the action of a majority of its stockholders, has accepted the provisions of this act, and is satisfied that said company has accepted and agreed to discharge all the duties and obligations imposed upon the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act of March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, line 5, after the word "the" and before the word "fourth" it is proposed to insert the words "second, third;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That the patents for the lands conveyed herein that have already been issued to said company be, and the same are hereby, confirmed; but the Secretary of the Interior is hereby fully authorized and instructed to apply the provisions of the second, third, fourth, and fifth sections of this act to any of said lands that have been so patented, and to protect any and all settlers on said lands in all their rights under the said Blanchard-Robinson agreement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed in line 8 of the same section to strike out the words "Blanchard-Robinson agreement," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "sections of this act;" so as to read:

And to protect any and all settlers on said lands in all their rights under the said sections of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. EUSTIS. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That the lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act entitled, "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and the lands covered thereby shall be considered and treated in all respects the same as if such grant had never been made: Provided, That any title to said lands acquired by purchase from any railroad company by any bona fide settler is hereby confirmed to said purchaser.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when Mr. ALDRICH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. ALDRICH] is paired with the Senator fron Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY]. I do not see his colleague in the Chamber, and I do not know how he would vote. I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HALE] is busy in the Committee on Appropriations and is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should note "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I will exchange, with the consent of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], the pair of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], and the Senator from Arkansas can then vote and so can I.

Mr. BERRY. I vote "yea."

Mr. BECK. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Berry,	Cockrell,	George,	Voorhees,
Blackburn,	Coke,	Vance,	Whitthorne,
Call,	Eustis,	Vest,

NAYS—35.

Allison,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sabin,
Blair,	Gibson,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sawyer,
Brown,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Chace,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Cheney,	Harris,	Palmer,	Teller,
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Payne,	Walthall,
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,	Williams,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa,
Dolph,	Mahone,	Pugh,

ABSENT—29.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Fair,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Gray,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Butler,	Hale,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Harrison,	Miller,	Wilson of Md.
Cameron,	Jones of Arkansas,	Mitchell of Pa.,
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to this bill and ask a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and Discovery of America, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As a matter of national interest, and one solely within the discretion and control of Congress, I transmit the accompanying memorial of the executive committee of the subconstitutional centennial commission, proposing to celebrate on the 17th of September, in the city of Philadelphia, as the day upon which, and the place where, the convention that framed the Federal Constitution concluded their labors, and submitted the results for ratification to the thirteen States then composing the United States.

The epoch was one of the deepest interest, and the events well worthy of commemoration.

I am aware that as each State acted independently in giving its adhesion to the new Constitution, the dates and anniversaries of their several ratifications are not coincident. Some action looking to a national expression in relation to the celebration of the close of the first century of popular government under a written Constitution has already been suggested, and while stating the great interest I share in the renewed examination by the American people of the historical foundations of their Government, I do not feel warranted in discriminating in favor of or against the propositions to select one day or place in preference to all others, and therefore content myself with conveying to Congress these expressions of popular feeling and interest upon the subject, hoping that in a spirit of patriotic co-operation, rather than of local competition, fitting measures may be enacted by Congress which will give the amplest opportunity all over these United States for the manifestation of the affection and confidence of a free and mighty nation in the institutions of a Government of which they are the fortunate inheritors, and under which unexampled prosperity has been enjoyed by all classes and conditions in our social system.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January, 18, 1887.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 170) authorizing an investigation of the books, accounts, and methods of Pacific railroads which have received aid from the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 807), granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave, out of order, to present a large number of petitions of soldiers now in the Army which were forwarded to my late colleague [Mr. LOGAN] just before his death, praying for the passage of the bill to amend the act of February 25, 1885, to authorize a retired-list for privates and non-commissioned officers of the Army. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. I present a petition numerously signed by my constituents in New York city, merchants and other business men, praying for the repeal of the internal taxes. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3106) granting a pension to Milton Teeter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. MAHONE. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., and the amendments of the House of Representatives thereto, to report a disagreement to the amendments of the other House, and ask for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MAHONE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. RANSOM were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of Henry A. Paus, to the Committee on Military Affairs;

The bill (H. R. 9868) for the relief of O. F. Adams, to the Committee on Claims; and

The bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, to the Committee on Pensions.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 170) authorizing an investigation of the books, accounts, and methods of Pacific railroads which have received aid from the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

W. D. HAVELY.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 7616) for the relief of W. D. Havely, which was inadvertently passed over yesterday in the consideration of pension bills.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of W. D. Havely, father of Robert M. Havely, late of Company C, Fifteenth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3169) granting a pension to Anna Mertz, as widow of Charles A. Mertz, late a private in Company K, Sixty-second Illinois Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3170) to authorize the Secretary of War to exchange guns with the R. E. Lee Volunteer Battery, of Pefersburg, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHITTHORNE introduced a bill (S. 3171) to authorize the Quartermaster-General to settle the claims of the trustees, directors, or other representatives of religious, charitable, and educational institutions for the use or occupancy by the Army of the United States of property belonging to them, upon the justice of said claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3172) for the relief of the estate of Andrew I. Duncan, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 95) relating to the title of the United States in the "lake front," at Chicago, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL substituted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING BILLS.

Mr. MAHONE. If there be no objection I shall ask the Senate in the morning, after we get through with the morning business, to take up certain public building bills and dispose of them. Most of them are House bills, and it is necessary that they should be disposed of in order that the Committee on Appropriations may make suitable provision on their account.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT-STATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 19, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 18, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CRISP, by unanimous consent, the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as related to the introduction of bills and resolutions was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

Mr. KING appeared, and took his seat.

LIGHT-HOUSE, CRAB TREE LEDGE, MAINE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board, relative to an appropriation for a light-house at Crab Tree Ledge, Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the papers in the Indian depredation claim of Cyrenus Beers, William Robinson, and Solomon Vail; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JACKSON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HEMPHILL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in document form the petition of the Guardian League, of the city of Washington, D. C.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, with the Senate amendments thereto. The amendments were ordered to be printed, and the bill and amendments were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BUILDING, INDIANAPOLIS.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 569) appropriating $45,000 for the improvement of the post-office building in the city of Indianapolis, and that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LIBBEY. Regular order.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. SKINNER submitted the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

The report was read.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The rules require that the managers on the part of the House should submit with the report a statement showing the effect of the amendments agreed upon by the conferees.

Mr. SKINNER. I shall be glad to make any explanation that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] may desire.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is one of the most important measures upon which this House can undertake to act; and I trust that my friend from North Carolina will not object to having the report published in the RECORD, and action on the question postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SKINNER. I do not object to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the conference report will lie over for the present, and, together with the statement of the House conferees, will be published in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The documents referred to are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 54) "to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the said amendment of the House, and insert in lieu thereof the following, namely:

"That in all cases where any tribe or band of Indians has been, or shall hereafter be, located upon any reservation created for their use, either by treaty stipulation or by virtue of an act of Congress or executive order setting apart the same for their use, the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever in his opinion any reservation or any part thereof of such Indians is advantageous for agricultural and grazing purposes, to cause said reservation, or any part thereof, to be surveyed, or resurveyed if necessary, and to allot the lands in said reservation in severalty to any Indian located thereon, in quantities as follows:

"To each head of a family, one-quarter of a section;

"To each single person over eighteen years of age, one-eighth of a section;

"To each orphan child under eighteen years of age, one-eighth section; and

"To each other single person under eighteen years now living, or who may be born prior to the date of the order of the President directing an allotment of the lands embraced in any reservation, one-sixteenth of a section: Provided, That in case there is not sufficient land in any of said reservations to allot lands to each individual of the classes above named in quantities as above provided, the lands embraced in such reservation or reservations shall be allotted to each individual of each of said classes pro rata in accordance with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That where the treaty or act of Congress setting apart such reservation provides for the allotment of lands in severalty in quantities in excess of those herein provided, the President, in making allotments upon such reservation, shall allot the lands to each individual Indian belonging thereon in quantity as specified in such treaty or act: And provided further, That when the lands allotted are only valuable for grazing purposes, an additional allotment of such grazing lands, in quantities as above provided, shall be made to each individual."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Strike out the word "two" in said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "four;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Insert after the word "may" and before the word "in" in said amendment, the words "in any case;" and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disgreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Add to said amendment the following words:

"And provided further, That no patents shall issue therefor except to the person so taking the same as and for a homestead, or his heirs, and after the expiration of five years' occupancy thereof as such homestead; and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, or lien thereon, created prior to the date of such patent, shall be null and void."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Insert in place of the words to be stricken out by said amendment, the following words:

"And the sums agreed to be paid by the United States as purchase-money for any portion of any such reservation shall be held in the Treasury of the United States for the sole use of the tribe or tribes of Indians to whom such reservations belonged, and the same, with interest thereon at 3 per cent. per annum, shall be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of such tribe or tribes of Indians or the members thereof."

And that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows, namely: Strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment, and insert instead thereof the following:

"SEC. 11. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from their present reservations in Southwestern Colorado to a new reservation by and with the consent of a majority of the adult male members of said tribe."

And that the House agree to the same.

T. G. SKINNER,
S. W. PEEL,
B. W. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. DAWES,
THOS. M. BOWEN,
J. K. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The House conferees on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the bill of the Senate (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, make the following detailed statement of the changes made by the committee of conference:

The changes from the bill as it passed the House, made by the conference report, are to House amendments numbered 1, 3, 7, 9, 10, and 19.

Amendment 1 authorized the Secretary of the Interior to have lands alloted to Indians in severalty "upon their application."

The conference report authorizes the allotments to be made by the President of the United States, without any application, whenever in his opinion any reservation or any part thereof is advantageous for agricultural or grazing purposes.

Amendment 3 provided that if any one entitled to allotment shall fail to make selection within two years after the President shall direct that allotment may be made on a particular reservation, that then a selection shall be made for said Indians.

The conference report extends this time to four years.

Amendment 7 allowed the President of the United States, in his discretion, to extend the period in which the lands alloted to individual Indians should be held in trust by the United States. The conference report only inserts the words "in any case," so as to require the President to extend this period only in special cases.

Amendment 9 provides that lands sold or released to the United States under this bill shall be held for the sole purpose of securing homes for actual settlers. The conference report only makes this purpose more explicit by requiring an actual residence upon the homestead by the settler or his heirs for five years before a patent shall issue.

As to amendment 10 the conference report requires that the sums agreed to be paid by the United States as purchase-money for lands acquired under the provisions of this bill to be held by the Treasury of the United States for the sole use of the tribe or tribes to whom such reservations belonged; and that the sum shall, with interest at 3 per cent. per annum, be at all times subject to appropriation by Congress for the education and civilization of such tribe or tribes of Indians or the members thereof.

This last change the managers on the part of the House did not deem important; but amendment 19 was as follows:

"SEC. 11. That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to abolish any reservation until the consent of a majority of the male members twenty-one years of age shall be first had and obtained."

The conference report strikes this amendment out, and in place of it enacts that this act shall not prevent the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from their present reservation in Southern Colorado with the consent of a majority of the adult male members of said tribe.

POST-OFFICE AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Mr. LIBBEY. I withdraw the demand for the regular order which I made a few moments ago when the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] was pending.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order is withdrawn. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which will be read, and that it be now put on its passage.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 569) appropriating $45,000 for the improvement of the post-office building in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COWLES. I object, and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back a bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

T. J. EDWARDS.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, also reported back a bill (H. R. 5060) for the relief of T. J. Edwards, administrator of David Edwards, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize gentlemen who were not in their seats when their committees were called.

There was no objection.

NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10241) for the appointment of a commission to investigate concerning losses and injuries inflicted since December 31, 1885, on United States citizens engaged in the North American fisheries; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF VISITORS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. VIELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy, with recommendation that 5,000 copies be printed and bound; that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JUDICIAL TITLES TO LAND.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10409) to annul certain titles to land acquired by judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States in Texas, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GENERAL TWIGGS'S SWORDS.

Mr. CUTCHEON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House joint resolution 134, a joint resolution (H. Res. 241) authorizing the President to return the Twiggs swords; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

The joint resolution No. 134 was ordered to be laid upon the table.

MRS. CARRIE E. HOPKINS.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10552) for the relief of Mrs. Carrie E. Hopkins, widow of Rev. Moses Hopkins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AARON FRIEDHEIM.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10653) to pay Aaron Friedheim the rebate due him under the act of March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN WILKES.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10791) providing for the adjudication of the claim of Benjamin Wilkes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM STAHLER.

Mr. LE FEVRE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10792) granting a pension to William Stahler; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROADS INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER. The hour for consideration begins at fifteen minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 170), and complete the consideration of the same in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow an amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is open to amendment I shall have no objection. I wish to submit one.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to gentlemen submitting amendments. Are there others than those proposed by the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HENLEY. I shall ask to submit an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The only objection I could urge against agreeing to permit so many amendments is the length of time that will probably be required to discuss them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think it will take very long.

Mr. HENLEY. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall not object.

Mr. REED. What is the proposition pending?

The SPEAKER. It is the consideration of the resolution proposing an investigation into the subsidized railroad companies, which was under consideration on Saturday in the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. To discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the resolution in the hour under the call, and consider it in the House.

Mr. REED. Then we do not have any consideration of it. That will be the result.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. They agree to give an opportunity to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has occupied twenty-nine minutes of his time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Insert after line 28:

"And also whether any dividends have been unlawfully paid on the capital stock of any of said companies; whether any new stock has been issued or any guarantees or pledges made without authority of law, and to investigate and report all the facts relating to a pretended consolidation of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, and Denver Pacific Railway Company into an alleged corporation known as the Union Pacific Railway Company."

The SPEAKER. This seems to be an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. That also is a proposition to insert certain words after the twenty-eighth line.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But has the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia yet been really offered? Notice, I understood, only was given of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand those amendments are not necessarily parts of each other.

The SPEAKER. They are not, but if the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is not an amendment to that of the gentleman from Georgia it is not in order at this time.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will be in order after the question is put on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas would then be in order; or it is in order now as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 28, after the word "use," by inserting "and also to inquire and report as to the kind, character, and amount of the assets of such of said companies as received aid from the Government in bonds; and what assets of each company are now subject to the lien of the Government, and the value thereof."

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas provides for a still further inquiry, and would be in order as an amendment to this.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I so offer it, and I desire simply to say this, that I think there will be no objection to this amendment for the reason that what it proposes is that the facts shall be ascertained and reported respecting a consolidation of the Union Pacific and these other companies mentioned, and the legal aspect of that it is proposed to submit to the Attorney-General. This amendment proposes that the facts as to the issue of stock and all that be ascertained.

I desire to say further that the State of Kansas by quo warranto proceedings some time ago proposed to test the matter of this consolidation, and this amendment is looking to an interest which the State I in part represent has in this whole question. As all parties seem agreed that this investigation shall be had, I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in May last the Committee on Pacific Railroads reported favorably the joint resolution which is now before us. I have submitted an amendment, which has just been reported by the Clerk, enlarging somewhat the scope of the commission to be appointed under the joint resolution. It is very important to know, and this commission can easily ascertain, the exact amount of property that is now owned by the subsidized Pacific railroads that is subject to the lien of the Government, and the value of it. That is the purpose of the amendment which I have offered.

As to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], I have only this suggestion to make. I have no choice about the matter except this, and I make this suggestion for the consideration of the House. The duties of the commission to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior under this resolution and under the amendment submitted by myself are purely of a business and mathematical character—to ascertain the amount of the property and the value of the property. The duties of the commission under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas would be to ascertain a legal question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. CRISP. I so understand it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Their duty under my amendment would be to ascertain all the facts in regard to the consolidation and as to the amount of stock.

Mr. CRISP. The objection I have to the gentleman's amendment, and the only objection I see to it, is that we want this commission of experts to ascertain facts and figures; and as I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas it proposes to obtain from the same commission a legal opinion as to what is the status of a particular company.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that impression. The amendment reads:

Whether any new stock has been issued or any guarantees or pledges made without authority of law——

Mr. CRISP. That is right.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas—and to investigate and report all the facts relating to a pretended consolidation—of the companies named.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield him another minute.

Mr. CRISP. What I was referring to was what I read in the RECORD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is another resolution.

Mr. CRISP. I may have misapprehended the gentleman's amendment. I was referring to what was introduced the other day and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There was an amendment and there was a resolution of inquiry. It is the latter to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CRISP. And that is not now pending?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No, sir.

Mr. CRISP. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. SPRINGER. Had not we better vote on these two amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] still occupies the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the amendments submitted may be regarded as pending.

The SPEAKER. They are. They are in order; but while they are pending no further amendments will be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be sent up and be considered as pending.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The amendments may be sent up, but they will not be read for the present, because this hour is devoted to debate, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has the floor. Gentlemen can send their amendments to the Clerk to be read at the proper time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I agree to that, Mr. Speaker, only as to certain amendments, the amendments of the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

The SPEAKER. Then those amendments may be sent up.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "use" in the 28th line insert "and whether any of the Pacific railroad corporations which obtained bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their railroads have expended any of their money or other assets in the construction, or to aid in the construction, of other railroads, or invested any of their money or other assets in the stocks or bonds of other railroad corporations. If any such expenditure or investments have been made, the extent and character thereof made by each of said corporations shall be inquired into, and also the present interest of any of said corporations in the railroads auxiliary to their respective railroads."

Mr. HOLMAN withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HENLEY. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read. The time is so limited there is no opportunity to debate this amendment. I will only remark that I think it a very necessary provision, and hope it will be adopted.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. HENLEY, as follows:

Amend section 1 by inserting after the word "much," in line 52:

"And whether any dividends have been illegally declared by the directors of said companies, and if so, to what extent; and whether the amount of such illegal dividends may not be recovered from the directors unlawfully declaring the same."

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether this resolution will confer any power not already possessed by the Commissioner of Railroads under the third section of the act of 1878. Cannot that commissioner, under the authority he now has, secure any and all information called for by this resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HAYDEN].

A MEMBER (to Mr. RICHARDSON). You have not answered the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HAYDEN. I will partially answer the gentleman from Iowa by saying that I think under the statute he has mentioned an investigation could be had by the Interior Department without the passage of this resolution. But, representing in some measure the Union Pacific Railroad and Mr. Adams in this matter, I desire to say to the Committee on Pacific Railroads and to members of the House that Mr. Adams has expressed a desire to have an investigation of all these matters embraced in the bill and amendments—an investigation of everything in relation to the Pacific railroads. I desire, in evidence of this statement, to call attention to a letter which Mr. Adams has addressed to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON], the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads. That letter, which appears in the Washington Post of this morning, I will not, owing to my scanty time, read now, but will take the liberty of printing in the RECORD.

I see by the papers that the House of Representatives is now considering the expediency of an investigation into the past history and money transactions of the Pacific railroads, as a preliminary to any final adjustment of the financial relations between those companies and the Government. It has also been asserted that the companies will strive to avoid such an investigation.

I do not want the position of the Union Pacific upon this point to be misunderstood. While as a matter of business expediency the company is most anxious to reach a final settlement with the Government, it does not fear any investigation of its affairs which may be ordered. It will do nothing to prevent or avoid one.

During the last fifteen years the Union Pacific Railway Company has been more frequently and thoroughly investigated than any other business corporation on earth. Committees of Congress have reported on it; Secretaries of the Interior and railroad commissioners have investigated its accounts; successive boards of Government directors have taken part in its management and scrutinized its every act; its books and records have been analyzed by the Department of Justice and Court of Claims. So far as I have been able to discover, there is nothing connected with its affairs or its history which Congress and the country do not know, or can not learn from the printed record.

If, under these circumstances, further investigation is deemed necessary, the present management will facilitate that investigation by all means in its power. Those connected with it only ask that any investigation had may be entrusted to men of character, standing, and intelligence, to the end that it may put a stop forever to those vague and scandalous assertions which are now made the pretext for further delays, affording infinite possibilities for stock manipulation. The interests of thousands of persons and whole regions of country thus become the football of any schemer or gambler who has access to the columns of some journal willing to increase its circulation by setting forth forgotten scandals of ancient history as new and startling discoveries.

What the Union Pacific, as a business corporation, does object to is, that delay which will keep it and its securities in position to be bandied to and fro between Wall street and Washington, the prey of intriguers and speculators.

The Government of the United States is by far the largest creditor of the Union Pacific, which, as a debtor at once willing and able to pay in full if dealt with on recognized principles, thinks it not unfair to ask its principal creditor not to let itself be used by competitors and stock jobbers as an instrument with which to injure the business resources and impair the credit of the debtor from whom payment of the last penny is still to be exacted.

I respectfully, but confidently, submit that to allow itself to be so used is neither justice, nor business, nor fair play.

In regard to this investigation of the Pacific railroads I wish to give a little of the history of this resolution originally introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. HENLEY]. The resolution was introduced for the purpose of obstructing any legislation on the extension bill then before the House or likely to come before the House. I will read for information——

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman will please not interrupt me at present.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman makes a statement which is incorrect; that is all.

Mr. HAYDEN. I desire to state a little history in relation to this investigation.

A man by the name of Reddington, who was a clerk in the railroad commissioner's office and who is now a resident of Washington, appeared at the offices of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in Boston on the 18th of January, 1886. But I will read:

On the 18th of January following, Mr. Reddington, the newly appointed chief expert in railroad accounts in the office of the commissioner, appeared at the offices of the company in Boston, and presented a letter of instructions, which he subsequently stated—with an emphasis which seemed to indicate that he deemed the fact of importance, and wished it clearly understood—he had himself drawn up. The letter of instructions was as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 14, 1886.

I desire to have this letter printed.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, can that be done except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It can not.

Mr. HENLEY. Then I object, unless I am permitted by the House to reply to the observations of the gentlemen from Massachusetts after he is through.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not object. I do not think it was dishonorable at all for the gentleman to seek to defeat that funding bill.

Mr. HENLEY. But the gentleman does not understand——

Mr. HAYDEN. I claim my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will read, at any rate, the last paragraph of this letter:

You are strictly enjoined to preserve in absolute secrecy all information obtained and report in writing upon your return. You will be assisted in this service by Mr. Thomas J. Walker, who will accompany you.

I remain, very truly yours,

J. E. JOHNSTON, Commissioner.

The report goes on:

At a meeting held on the following day the executive committee of the board of directors appointed a subcommittee to aid Mr. Reddington in the investigations referred to. Every facility was afforded him. The examination was finished on the 26th of January, and Mr. Reddington left the office of the company professing himself much gratified at the way he had been received, and entirely satisfied with the results of his visit. He further announced that as soon as he reached Washington, which would be in the course of a few days, orders would be received from the Interior Department forbidding any further payments on the part of the Union Pacific Railway Company to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company under existing contracts. Mr. Reddington also confidently predicted a rapid fall in the market value of the stock of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Now what I wish to state is, that everything that has been done in relation to the obstruction of the consideration of the extension bill has been done through and inspired by this man. It has been a stock-jobbing operation from the beginning to the end. He examined the accounts of the Union Pacific Railroad. When he went there, he said he did not believe they had the securities which they said they had. He went to Boston, and stated there that he never had any idea he should see the bonds and stocks of this company. But, as he called them off from the return as made by the railroad company, they were produced, and he examined them, and every item was correct. This is a partial reply to something which has been said this morning in relation to an amendment which has been introduced here.

Now, on the 8th of March——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. LONG. O, no; let my colleague go on.

Mr. HAYDEN. Only two minutes longer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have but a few minutes left.

Mr. HAYDEN. I beg the gentleman not to forget he told me he would give me ten minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HAYDEN. You promised me an additional five minutes.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts be granted an additional three minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. HENLEY. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is allowed to proceed for five minutes longer, and I am allowed five minutes in which to reply, I shall have no objection. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated in plain words members of the House on the Pacific Railroad extension bill are inspired on this floor by some lobbyist. He saw fit to arraign myself.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California object?

Mr. HENLEY. I object unless I have three minutes to reply.

Mr. HAYDEN. We will give you five minutes?

Mr. HENLEY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am very sorry I can not go into this matter in detail. But let me go on.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen object. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] The Chair so understood.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am willing to yield for two minutes longer to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HAYDEN. I pass from this Readington episode and come to the present time. When it appeared that this extension bill was likely to be considered by this Congress there appeared in the public prints, and have appeared in the public prints since last April, charges against the gentleman from Georgia and other members of the committee. At one time the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who has been active in this committee, has been charged in the public prints of New York with being Mr. Huntington's man. Every man on this committee has been charged with doing what is wicked and corrupt. Now, then, we ask, in consideration of the charges, that this extension bill and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] as presented shall be considered by the House, and that we shall not be branded as having been corrupt in the Pacific Railroad Committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the questions involved in the extension will not be brought up on this matter. I demand the previous question. We have but little time left, and I hope we will vote as rapidly as we can on the amendments as they come up.

Mr. HENLEY. I ask, by unanimous consent, for two minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Take it after we pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks to speak for two minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope, by unanimous consent, the time will be allowed to the gentleman, not to be taken out of this hour.

Mr. HENLEY. I think I am entitled to be heard after what has been said on this floor this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not to be taken out of the hour.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is only fair.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HAYDEN] has made an allegation here that I think, on cooler reflection, he will not be disposed to stand to, and that is that every person on this floor, including the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and all others who, in the discharge of their duty, see fit to antagonize this Pacific extension bill, were inspired to do so—that was the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts—by stock jobbers.

Mr. HAYDEN. And I stick to it.

Mr. HENLEY. He says he sticks to it. The man who says, so far as I am concerned, I was inspired by any stock jobbers, I can not reply to on this floor, because if I did my words would have to be taken down, and I prefer to keep myself within the limits of parliamentary decorum. I might make retort on the gentleman from Massachusetts, who seems, in the estimation of some of the newspapers, to have signalized himself on this floor as a defender and upholder of the outrages and wrongs charged against the Union Pacific Railroad management.

I do not make that charge myself; but I do say that it has been alleged in the newspapers of the country.

So far, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman seeks to introduce charges or allegations, culled from newspapers, against the gentleman from Georgia, I wish to say that I have never seen anything of that sort myself, and it would not have given me any concern if I had. I say further, that by every means on the face of the earth, honorable and parliamentary, we upon the other side intend to defeat, if we can, this Pacific extension funding bill, to whose interest the gentleman seems so much devoted.

Mr. HANBACK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HANBACK. I merely wish to ask, in the line of the gentleman's remarks, how he expects to secure the indebtedness of these roads to the Government?

Mr. HENLEY. Not by giving them additional millions and millions of dollars, as I think that bill does.

Mr. SPRINGER. We want the railroads to pay their debts, not the Government. The extension bill appears to me to permit the roads to get rid of their debts without paying them.

Mr. HENLEY. That is it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I stated a few minutes ago, and stick to it, that the inspiration of this resolution came from people who were nterested in stock-jobbing. If the gentleman who has just spoken is innocent in taking it up and carrying it on I have no charge against him. I gave the sources of my information; but when the gentleman says that I accuse the honorable gentleman from Indiana with being engaged in stock-jobbing, I can only reply that the gentleman from California knows better than to attribute such a thing to me.

Mr. HENLEY. Your explanation puts a very different face upon it now.

Mr. HAYDEN. I decline to be interrupted. I wish to say to the gentleman from California that the sole object of the opposition is for the purpose of defeating the consideration of a bill which will put money into the Treasury of the United States. I do not know what grievances he has. I know nothing of the matter in that light; but I do know that it has been a constant thing for him, in season and out of season, to make charges against Mr. Charles Francis Adams, which, I say without hesitation, are entirely without foundation; and that is the position I take here now; for I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to be able to stand up on this floor in defense of an honorable gentleman who is not able to defend himself from such charges.

I am in favor of an extension bill such as that proposed because I believe it is good business judgment to do so. Some sort of settlement should be made with these companies, and I am glad to stand here to protect the interests of the United States against these stock-jobbers in railroad corporations. That is my position.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the demand of the gentleman from Tennessee for the previous question.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 95, noes, 10.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe there is no opposition to any of these amendments?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the vote will be taken upon all of them together.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I demand a separate vote upon each amendment.

Mr. LONG. Can we not have the first amendment read on which a vote is to be taken?

The SPEAKER. The first amendment is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think the question is clearly understood, and ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment proposed by Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CRISP as amended was read and agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I believe objection is withdrawn to taking a vote on the remaining amendments.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HENLEY was again read, and agreed to.

The amendment proposed by Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, was again read, and agreed to.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HOLMAN was again read, and agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River and the Committee on Education were called.

The Committee on Labor was called.

CONSIDERATION OF THE EDUCATION BILL.

Mr. DANIEL. I am authorized and instructed by the Committee on Labor to call up the House resolution fixing the 19th of January for the consideration of the education bill.

The Clerk read the original resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 10th day of June, 1886, be set apart for the consideration of House bill 7266, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," which was referred to the Committee on Labor and reported with amendments; and that its consideration be continued from day to day until finally disposed of; and that said bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

If the consideration of said bill be displaced, then the next day not previously set apart shall be devoted to its consideration, and so on, until the same shall be disposed of.

The Clerk read the substitute proposed by the Committee on Labor, as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, January 19, 1887, be set apart for the consideration of House bill 7266, entitled "A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," which was referred to the Committee on Labor and reported with amendments; and that its consideration be continued from day to day until finally disposed of; and that said bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

If the consideration of said bill be displaced, then the next day not previously set apart shall be devoted to its consideration, and so on, until the same shall be disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that as this resolution involves a change of rules it must lie over for one day.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was reported from the committee some time ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has that ever been held to be notice under the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect where notice has been given otherwise than by the introduction and reference of a resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make this point of order: This bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that requirement can not be changed except in the ordinary mode of changing the rules.

This is not a proposition to postpone the consideration of a bill to a day certain, but it is a proposition to take it out of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where it goes under the rules and can be considered under the rules, and to bring it to the House for consideration there, to the exclusion of all other business.

I have never known a special order coming from a committee which proposed to change the rules so as to permit the consideration in the House of a measure of this importance. This is a departure from all the precedents, and as the resolution involves a change of the rules it should go first to the Committee on Rules, and be there considered and reported. The time to report it is in the morning hour of Monday, when amendments to the rules are in order for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Under the rules this bill can be called up for consideration at this time; and then the gentleman who represents the committee can move to postpone it to a day certain when it would have the same status as it has now. At present we are under the operation of an order which allows one hour for the consideration of bills reported from a committee; but this resolution gives it not only the hour, but gives all the rest of the session to complete this bill, not in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but in the House, where the previous question can be ordered, and all debate and amendments cut off.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to amend the resolution——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order, and that must first be decided. It is a very common practice in the House to set apart a day for the consideration of a particular bill; and even if the resolution for that purpose did not by its terms take the bill out of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and bring it into the House, it has always been decided that the effect of making a bill a special order was to take it out of the Committee of the Whole and bring it into the House for consideration under the rules of the House. This resolution, however, modifies that and provides the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, which enlarges the liberty of debate and amendment. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Virginia is in order in calling up the resolution in this hour.

Mr. DANIEL. I move to amend by striking out "Wednesday, January 19," and inserting "Saturday, January 29;" and upon the resolution and amendment I demand the previous question.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him to modify the resolution so as to make the assignment after the hour for the consideration of bills? Many members would vote for the resolution who can not vote for it unless the morning hour is given to the consideration of bills.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is right.

Mr. DANIEL. I am willing to accept that suggestion, and to make the resolution read "after the morning hour."

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Does that require unanimous consent, the previous question having been demanded?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been ordered, and no action has been taken by the House upon the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I now ask the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. We have a right to know what the amendment is. It has not yet been reported from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "Wednesday, January 19," and insert "Saturday, January 29;" and after "1887" insert the words "after the morning hour for the consideration of bills."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Pending that, I move to lay the resolution on the table; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 166, not voting 76; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. HATCH (at 1.45 p. m.). Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The hour has not expired, but even if it had, the universal practice has been to complete a roll-call which is in progress. Under the rules, the hour will expire at the end of this roll-call.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. BURLEIGH.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. SWINBURNE.
Mr. FORNEY with Mr. PAYNE.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. CANDLER with Mr. WEST.
Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. PAYSON.
Mr. REESE with Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska.
Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. WHITING.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.
Mr. KING with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. GILFILLAN.
Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HISCOCK.
Mr. SNYDER with Mr. BUCHANAN.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. LAIRD.
Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL with Mr. HANBACK.
Mr. NEECE with Mr. HARMER.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. MCCOMAS.
Mr. BARRY with Mr. JACKSON.
Mr. BOYLE with Mr. BRADY.

Mr. STAHLNECKER and Mr. BINGHAM were announced as paired on this vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I was not on the floor of the House when my name was called, but was in the room of the Committee on Appropriations. If I had been present I would have voted "yea."

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to make a similar announcement, Mr. Speaker. I was necessarily absent from the floor of the House, but if I had been present I should have voted "yea."

Mr. RANNEY. Mr. Speaker, I happened to be absent at the moment my name was called. Had I been present I should have voted "yae."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order to-morrow. The subject is not now before the House. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will state his motion.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for present consideration the conference report on the bill commonly known as the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. HATCH. Upon that I raise the question of consideration. I desire to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill known as the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] raises the question of consideration against the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill.

The question is, will the House now proceed to consider the report of the committee of conference?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 109, noes 45.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not press his demand. It is evident that the disposition of the House is to proceed now to the consideration of this conference report, and the demand for the yeas and nays would simply consume time, and postpone still longer the consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I desire to reach the consideration of that bill at the earliest possible moment, but I do not wish to take up unnecessarily the time of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not press the demand.

Mr. ROWELL, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority in the contested-election case of Page vs. Pirce, which were ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Co.;

An act (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton;

An act (H. R. 1085) for the relief of Albion S. Keith;

An act (H. R. 7879) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia; and

An act (H. R. 9736) to grant the Maricopa and Phœnix Railway Company of Arizona the right of way through the Gila River Indian reservation.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report of the conference committee be dispensed with. It has been printed in the RECORD by order of the Senate, and again printed in the RECORD by order of the House. I have no doubt it is familiar to members; and any gentleman desiring to do so can send for a copy in document form, and have it before him as we go on with the consideration of the bill. In the interest merely of economy of time I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of that report.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia will permit me to say I do not desire to have any time consumed simply for the purpose of consuming time, but I think it best that this report should be read. It will not take more than fifteen minutes to read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report of the conference committee, it having already been printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not care to have the bill read, but I think the report ought to be read. The report of the conferees is all that I desire to have read.

Mr. CRISP. I do not ask to dispense with reading the explanatory statement of the conferees, but only the formal report of the committee.

Mr. DUNHAM. It is the detailed statement of the conferees that I desire to have read.

Mr. CRISP. I have not asked to dispense with the reading of that.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the reading of the conference report will be dispensed with, and the explanatory statement of the conferees will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT OF CONFEREES ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

[Required by Rule XXIX.]

The House conferees on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the bill of the Senate "to regulate commerce," and the bill of the House "to regulate commerce among the States, and prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers," make the following detailed statement of the changes between the House bill and the substitute herewith appended:

The action of the House being to adopt a single amendment, your committee, without attempting to call attention to the precise changes made in each section of the bill, report to the House the substance and effect of the changes made, as follows:

The bill of the House applied only to the transportation of freight, and the bill as adopted embraces the transportation of passengers as well as freight.

The bill of the House was limited to the regulation of such transportation on railroads. The bill as reported provides for the regulation of the transportation of property partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement, for a continuous carriage or shipment from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia.

The bill which we report defines the term "railroad" as used in it, to include all bridges, ferries used or operated with any railroad, which is in addition to the provisions of the House bill.

The second section of the substitute bill adopts substantially the provisions of the House bill against discrimination by special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and other devices, and declares that any one making such discrimination shall be guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful.

The third section of the substitute embraces substantially the provisions of the bill of the House, in requiring equal facilities and advantages for all shippers, without exception, and has a provision requiring equal facilities for the interchange of traffic with all other railroads for the carriage of property and passengers, and forbids any discrimination by one railroad in the facilities furnished against any other railroad. It contains a clause declaring that this act shall not be construed as requiring such common carrier to give the use of its tracks or terminal facilities to any common carrier engaged in like business.

The fourth section adopts substantially the provisions of the House bill on the long and short haul, with the following proviso: That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for a longer than for a shorter distance for the transportation of passengers and property, and that the commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section.

The fifth section of the substitute bill is a copy of the clause in the House bill prohibiting pooling, with an amendment striking out the words of the House bill "by dividing," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or to divide," and with the addition of the words in line 3, after the word "combination," "with any other common carrier or carriers."

The sixth section is a substitute for the provisions of the House and Senate bills in relation to the publication of schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property. Instead of requiring the rates to be posted up, as was provided in the House bill, it requires that, after ninety days from the passage of the act, every common carrier subject to its provision shall have printed and keep for public inspection schedules showing such rates, fares, and charges, and, in addition to requiring the railroads to give publicity at all of the depots on their several lines, it gives authority to the commission, where it is proper and necessary to require them to give publicity to their rates to other places beyond the lines of their several railroads.

It also provides that the rates, fares, and charges shall not be raised except after ten days of public notice, but that they may be reduced without previous public notice; the notice, however, shall be simultaneous with the reduction itself, and it requires that all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the commission provided for in the bill copies of the schedules which have been established, and shall promptly notify said commission of all changes made in the same; and that they shall file with the commission copies of all contracts, arrangements, or agreements with other common carriers in relation to traffic affected by the provisions of this bill; and in cases where passengers and freights pass over continuous lines or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates or fares or charges of such continuous lines or routes, copies of such joint tariffs shall also be filed with the commission, and made public, if so directed by the commission.

The section also provides that where a common carrier subject to its provisions shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its schedules of tariff or rates and fares, or any part of the same, such common carrier shall, in addition to the penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States, in any judicial district wherein the principal office of the common carrier is situated, or wherein such offense may be committed, requiring a compliance with the provisions of the act.

The seventh section of the substitute bill contains substantially the provisions of the first part of the second section of the House bill, in relation to the continuous carriage of property and persons from the place of shipment to the place of destination.

The eighth section of the substitute bill contains the substance of the seventh section of the House bill, in regard to damages and counsel fees, but expressed in somewhat different language.

The ninth section of the substitute bill is a new section, which provides that persons claiming to have been damaged by the action of common carriers may proceed for recovery of their damages either in the courts of the United States or before the commission herein provided for, as they may elect, but not before both tribunals. This section, which gives jurisdiction to courts of the United States, does not give jurisdiction in civil suits to the State courts, as was provided for in the House bill.

This section of the substitute bill also provides that the courts shall have power to compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of the corporation or company defendant in such suit, to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation or company party to any such suit; and it provides further that the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but that such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The tenth section of the substitute bill makes it a penal offense to violate any of the provisions of this act, and is substantially the eighth section of the House bill, except that it puts the maximum of the fine which may be imposed at the sum of $5,000 instead of $2,000, as was provided for by the House bill.

The eleventh and subsequent sections to the twenty-first, inclusive of the substitute bill, contain the substance of the Senate's bill providing for a commission, except as modified by the provisions of the substitute bill herein recited.

It provides for a commission to consist of five persons whose term of office shall be for six years, except for the first appointments, which are to be for two, three, four, five, and six years. The members of this commission are to be appointed by the President by and with the advice of the Senate. Their principal office shall be in Washington, but they may hold sessions at other places than Washington, and a single member of the commission may take testimony anywhere, as may be directed by the commission.

These commissioners have salaries of $7,500 each. The commission has the power to appoint a secretary, with an annual salary of $3,500, and has authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employés as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The nineteenth section of the Senate's bill, providing for a reference of the question of pooling to the commission, is not embraced in this substitute.

Section 22 of the substitute bill, among other things, provides that nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but that the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies, with a proviso that no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act.

Section 24 of the substitute bill provides that the act shall go into effect sixty days after its passage, as in the opinion of your committee it was deemed best to give the railroads sufficient time to prepare their schedules and to modify their management in accordance with the provisions of this bill. The appointment of the commission, however, is to be made at once, as it has to be organized, and as said schedules of rates and charges have to be filed with said commission.

J. H. REAGAN,
CHARLES F. CRISP,
A. J. WEAVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I propose now to explain, somewhat, the provisions of this bill, and the action of the managers who represented the House in the conference. I am not informed as to the disposition of the House with regard to debating this report. If it were possible to have now any understanding looking to the fixing of such early time for a vote on this question as may be consistent with a proper discussion of so important a measure, I should be very glad indeed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I think it best the debate should be permitted to run on a while, before attempting at all to limit it.

Mr. DUNHAM. After the debate has proceeded for a time, we can then better see what limit should be fixed. Two hours hence we can tell better than we can now when we desire the debate to stop.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The Senate occupied nearly two weeks in the discussion of this report.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestions of gentlemen, I shall not at this time undertake to secure any limitation of the debate on this question.

For many years attention has been directed to the practices of common carriers, transporters of commerce from State to State—practices which have been generally understood and believed to be unjust to the public. Year after year the agitation of the question of regulating such commerce has been brought to the attention of the Representatives of the people. At the last session of Congress, this House, by a very large majority, passed a bill known as "the Reagan bill," the purpose and intent of which was to protect the people from unjust charges by common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

At the last session, also, the Senate of the United States passed a bill known as "the Cullom bill," having for its object the regulation of the carriage of commerce between the States. These bills were dissimilar; they brought about a disagreement between the two Houses upon a question which, as the votes of the two Houses clearly indicated, each House was anxious to adjust satisfactorily. In that state of the case a conference committee, consisting of three members of each House, was appointed; and those conferees, before the assembling of Congress, met in the Capitol and made an earnest effort to agree upon a plan which would afford some relief to the people of the United States. I need not say that, representing views so different as those which had been expressed by the two Houses, the conferees on the one part and on the other had to yield something of their convictions as to what ought to be done. The result of those labors is presented in the pending report.

I feel, as one of the conferees on the part of the House, the only one of them now present, that an explanation should be made of this bill. I feel you ought to be told what we understand to be the meaning of any part of this bill any gentleman wants to inquire about, and I feel you ought to be informed that the bill as presented is the result of a compromise made between Representatives who earnestly desire to afford some relief to the people of the United States.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, at this late day, in the discussion of this great question, undertake to present to this House all the reasons that exist why legislation should be had on this subject. I take it for granted that every man in the House who regards railroading as a business in which the public has an interest understands and concedes that some regulation, some provision, some law is necessary to protect the people against the practices on the part of railroads, which have so unjustly burdened the great body of shippers, and occasioned a demand for legislation from every State in the Union.

In the arguments made by the representatives of these corporations as a reason why legislation should not be had, in my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the error lies in the fact that they fail to recognize the character of the corporation which they represent. They come before the committees of the House, they go before the country making an argument in vindication of their practices, which might be, in many cases, forcible if they were talking about a private business, if they were talking about a business in which the public had not an interest, if they were talking about a business which could exist without the consent of the Government. If we will bring our minds to a recognition of the fact—because there we must at last come—that a railroad company is a corporation created by the public, for the benefit of the public, that while the corporators and owners of the franchise have a right to charge reasonable tolls, they take that right burdened with obligations to the public which are of paramount importance and which can not be disregarded, we can, without difficulty, arrive at just conclusions.

A railroad can not be built in any State of this Union except by the exercise, on the part of such State, of the right of eminent domain. The State can exercise that right in no case except for the public good—for the public use. No State and no power can take from an individual property which he owns and give it to another. It can be taken by the State for only one purpose—for public use—and then only on just compensation.

Railroad companies are chartered by the States, or by the United States. The power that grants a charter grants it, although it may not be so nominated in the charter, for the public good.

Therefore it is, Mr. Speaker, the people have rights in regard to these corporations and great transportation agencies which they would not have if it were a business conducted by private individuals.

The error, therefore, I say, in the arguments presented to sustain the present practices arises from a misconception of the character of these corporations. And I mention that now so the House and each member may bear in mind in what we propose to do we are dealing with a corporation or corporations in which the public interest is paramount. And while we do not seek, and should not seek, to deprive investors of reasonable returns for their investments, if the public interest demands it private interest must give way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having called the attention of the House to that fundamental principle, which I believe is not now disputed, I propose to invite attention to the provisions of the bill, or some of them, which we suggest for consideration. In many of the provisions of this bill, I understand, we all agree. Those provisions which seek to enforce equality between the shippers, I understand nobody objects to. The bill provides that no preference shall be given to one shipper over another, that no drawback, or rebate, or device shall be authorized or permitted which allows discrimination in favor of one shipper against another; that no practice shall be tolerated which permits discrimination for or against a particular locality, that no practice shall be allowed which permits a railroad company to discriminate for or against a connecting railroad or other railroad company which may receive or want to receive freight from the railroad company so carrying. The act also provides that all rates charged by a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall be reasonable and just.

Those provisions, Mr. Speaker, I understand meet the approbation of all. Those, like some other provisions in this bill, to which I shall refer, are the provisions, as I understand it, of the common law of the land where we live. I understand that each one of these provisions is maintained by the common law; and therefore there should be and can be no reason, I submit, why any member should object to this portion of the bill.

The next point to which I shall refer, and which has excited some controversy, one perhaps that has received more attention in the public discussions and in the public press than any other section, is the fourth, that referring to what is commonly called the long and short haul. I will ask the Clerk to read the fourth section of the bill, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Mr. CRISP. That section, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, has given rise to a great deal of controversy, and I feel it incumbent upon me to present to the House in the utmost candor my view of its meaning. Of course, I do not presume to say that my view of it is the absolutely correct one, but I can state what I believe it to mean. I can state what I intended it to mean when I gave my assent to the placing of it in this bill.

The great object the committee had in view was to say that a transportation company should not charge unreasonable rates, and should not discriminate against individuals or places. We believe, or I believe, that the principle upon which the rates should be fixed in the transportation business is the cost to the company of transporting the goods, the cost of their plant, the value of their line, the cost of terminal facilities, &c., with allowance for a reasonable profit on the investment.

I do not believe, sir, that extraneous circumstances ought to affect the question of charges. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is any business of the transportation company where goods come from that are to be shipped over their line, any more than I believe it is their business to know where the goods go after passing from their line. I believe that their legitimate business is the transportation, for reasonable rates, of such freights as may be given to them by any individual or by other corporations for transportation.

Believing such to be the case, my understanding of this section is that the purpose is to bring about reasonable rates without discrimination; and under this section the amount charged by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce for transporting freight over its entire line is the maximum rate that may be charged for transporting freight over a part of it only, the freight and the circumstances being substantially similar. I do not mean to say, nor does the bill say that it would be reasonable and just to charge as much for the short as for the long haul, but it does say that more shall not be charged. I do not understand that the word "line" as used in that section means anything different from road as defined in the bill:

The term "railroad" as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not want to anticipate the argument of my friend, but I trust that he will at this point explain what is meant by the words "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," and give an illustration of what he understands by similar conditions and circumstances and those which are dissimilar, and which will authorize a change in rates. Of course he knows that we can learn more readily by illustration than by precept.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has not given me a very easy task. The provision we make is that where the circumstances are substantially similar the shorter haul shall not be charged more than the greater. I can not undertake in a debate like this to determine for the gentleman exactly what would constitute "substantially similar circumstances." That would be a matter into which I could not now enter; and I submit it is hardly fair to ask me to define "substantially similar circumstances" as used in the bill.

Mr. LONG. But is it not necessarily what a judge would have to do in instructing a jury?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is the point; for if my friend were a commissioner he would have to define it.

Mr. CRISP. If complaint is made to the commission of the violation of the rule prescribed in the fourth section of this bill, the commission, after hearing both sides, would determine in the particular case made whether or not the complaint was well founded. Necessarily in deciding that question they would determine whether or not the circumstances were substantially similar in the case of the long haul and in the case of the short haul presented in the complaint. That is the object and purpose of the commission in that regard. If the individual did not go to the commission, but went to the courts, then, Mr. Speaker, the courts, the judge, and the jury would determine that question. I am not prepared, sir, to say, in answer to the suggestion of my friend from Massachusetts, Governor LONG, that the court would tell the jury what "substantially similar circumstances" meant.

Mr. LONG. No; but the judge would have to tell the jury what the legal effect of the words is.

Mr. CRISP. I think the judge would say to the jury, after hearing all the evidence, that if they believed more had been charged for the short than for the long haul of like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, then they should find for the complainants, leaving the jury to determine in each case whether the property was of like kind and whether the circumstances and conditions were substantially similar.

Mr. SCOTT. Will my friend from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. There is a line of railroad known as the New York Central Railroad extending from Buffalo to the city of New York entirely within the jurisdiction of the State of New York, and all rates made from Buffalo to the city of New York would not come under this bill. This bill can not affect the rates of that railroad. Then there is what is known as the great chain of lakes extending from Buffalo to Chicago entirely open to the competition of every vessel and every vessel-owner competing for the great trade of the Northwest. When that trade is brought from Duluth and from Chicago and delivered at the port of Buffalo, it immediately becomes State commerce and is not then within the jurisdiction of your bill.

There is another line of railroad inland extending from the city of Chicago, and known as the Pennsylvania railroad system, being the Pennsylvania Railroad from the city of Philadelphia to the city of Pittsburgh, and there connecting with a line controlled by and known as the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad, extending to the city of Chicago. And all the trans-continental commerce consequently carried by that system of road has to be carried inland. How can you, therefore, possibly, under the provisions of your bill, treat equitably and fairly these two great systems of trans-continental roads when the competitive traffic is delivered by lake at Buffalo coming in under the jurisdiction of New York State, and the inland line running from Chicago to the city of New York, which comes in under your bill becomes subject to the prohibitory provisions that they shall not do so and so?

Mr. CRISP. The Congress of the United States have no authority under the Constitution to regulate the transportation of commerce wholly within a State. The States of the American Union under the Constitution have no right to regulate the transportation of commerce between the States. The line is clearly marked.

The question of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] involves the idea that because we can not regulate the transportation of commerce within the State of New York we shall not therefore regulate the transportation of commerce between the States. See, Mr. Speaker, the position in which that would leave and I might say has left the American people for many years. Until quite recently, sir, there were many believers in the policy of railway regulation who insisted that the true method was to leave to each State the regulation of transportation through and over its territory, and you found men who recognized the necessity for legislation, but felt that it was a dangerous step for Congress to take and insisted that the States should legislate for the regulation of each line within its borders.

The Supreme Court of the United States before whose decisions we all must bow, have decided that commerce, interstate commerce, commerce passing from one State into or through another could not be regulated, nor could the carriage of it be regulated by the State law. If, therefore, we are to wait before we discharge our duty under the Constitution to the people until the State of New York, or the State of Massachusetts, or any other State discharges its duty, in the meantime I ask you who is to protect the great body of the people from the aggression of these vast monopolies? All that we can do in this case or in any other is to discharge our duty under the law; to take no step that will impair the right of the States, but to leave undone nothing that we can constitutionally do that will aid the people to just and reasonable rates of transportation of person or property between the States.

If the evil suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania exists, then when we discharge our duty I think we can confidently rely upon the people of that great State to discharge theirs.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia this: Whether or no the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not rather in the nature of a suggestion how it was possible to evade the provisions of this bill, than anything else?

Mr. CRISP. I was answering the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania because I understood him to mean by the case that he cited, that because perhaps the railroad wholly within the State of New York could not be required by this act to do or leave undone anything, its passage would be unjust to other railroads competing for the same business who would be controlled by our legislation. Therefore, it is that I am making the suggestion I do.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask a question in furtherance of an understanding about this?

Mr. CRISP. It will be remembered my time is limited; still I will gladly yield to any gentleman who desires to ask a question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is only to complete the construction of a sentence in the question which I wished to ask a moment ago. Does the fact that there is water competition along a part of the line and not along the whole line change the condition within the terms of this act? In other words, suppose from A to C there is water competition, and in order to obtain the freight, a certain rate, about that which should be charged for transportation by water, were charged suppose from A to B, B being between A and C, but nearer C, there being no water competition between B and C—would you say the circumstances and conditions touching the shipments to the two points B and C were substantially the same, and hence that the carrier would not be authorized to charge an increased rate to C?

Mr. BRUMM. Is not that rather a question of construction?

Mr. CRISP. I will say, because I do not wish to conceal any opinion I entertain on any provision of the bill, that in my judgment the fact that there is competition there does not affect the question.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then my friend will agree that the long haul is practically abolished as between A and C?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] as to the meaning of that provision, I can not agree in his suggestion that the long haul is abolished. Why, sir, within the margin fixed by the bill, see the advantage that the long haul has. It must be remembered that there is no attempt in this bill to require any transportation company to make a pro rata or so much per mile charge.

So far as the restriction in the fourth section of the bill is concerned, they may charge as much for the short as for the long haul. Now let me answer the gentleman's question upon the idea that these railroads are common carriers established for the benefit of the public. Here is a line of railroad from New York to New Orleans, made up of connecting lines. At New Orleans there is water transportation, as there is at New York. That line of railroads will haul freight from New York to New Orleans for 76 cents a hundred, while to Atlanta, which is about half way or a little more, the charge is $1 a hundred. Goods that go from New York to New Orleans by rail go through Atlanta and nearly as far again as they went in reaching Atlanta, and when they get to New Orleans they pay 76 cents a hundred; whereas, if they had stopped at Atlanta and saved nearly half the haul they would have had to pay $1 a hundred.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, if the gentleman will indulge me right there, I will not interrupt him again. He will concede that the charge to New Orleans is based upon the competition with water—that, because of that competition, the railroad companies can not charge and receive a higher rate. Now, since they must charge that low rate which they do charge to New Orleans in order to secure the business, I ask the gentleman to explain to the House how it will benefit Atlanta to cut off that long-haul rate from New York to New Orleans? He will bear in mind that it is impossible for them to get the freight for New Orleans at all unless they charge such a rate as will enable them to compete with water transportation. If that business is lost to the railroad companies because they are not allowed to charge the lower rate to New Orleans for the reason that they can not reduce the rate to Atlanta, will the gentleman explain how Atlanta will be benefited?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But your assumptions are not correct.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They are correct.

Mr. CRISP. Atlanta, I take it for granted, is entitled in the case suggested to reasonable rates. What is or what is not a reasonable rate is a question of fact, which must be settled by what?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. By all the circumstances.

Mr. CRISP. By the question of competition, or by the question of cost?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Competition is one of the circumstances, of course. When a road is built the probability of competition is one of the circumstances to be considered, because it will get no freight unless it can carry as cheaply as its competitors.

Mr. CRISP. I suggest to my friend that right there, in my humble judgment, is one great error which is made by the transportation companies. They lose sight of the business for which they were organized. The gentleman says that if the railroads do not haul at such a price from New York to New Orleans they can not get any business. They ought not to have any business unless they can make a reasonable profit upon it, and if the rate of 76 cents between New York and New Orleans pays a reasonable profit, what kind of a profit, I ask you, does the dollar rate from Atlanta to New York pay, the distance being only about half as great?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why, it amounts to larceny! [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. But if they make no money by doing business at the rate between New York and New Orleans, then there is a double burden upon the intermediate points along the line, because they are taxed to make up what has been lost upon the through transportation. So at last, my friend from Ohio, it is a question of the reasonableness of the rate.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly, all things considered.

Mr. CRISP. Under the fourth section of this bill discrimination can be made to this extent, that the railroad company may charge as much for the short haul as for the long haul. Let the question be addressed to any man of ordinary understanding: Is it reasonable and just that a corporation which owes its existence to the public, and is bound to exercise its franchises for the benefit of the public, shall take an article of freight in the city of New York, and if it delivers that article at a distance of 500 miles from New York shall receive a dollar for carrying it, but if it carries it 500 miles farther shall receive but 75 cents? What must be the answer? Does that strike any gentleman as a reasonable and fair business proposition

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend knows very well that to get the freight at all to a given point the railroads must compete with their competitors. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CRISP. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, if competing rates do not pay any profit, but barely the cost of the transportation, must the railroads turn that business away? If not, if they are allowed to carry it, it certainly helps to pay expenses, and thereby, to some extent, takes the burden off the short haul. Just how the public is injured by that is what I ask the gentleman to explain.

Here is a little town, if you please, twenty miles from this city where the people have been accustomed to pay 6 cents a bushel for hauling all their coal. A railroad company builds a line passing that town and extending to some point beyond, where there is water competition. The railroad company says to the people at this intermediate point, "What has it been your custom to pay for hauling your coal?" The answer is "6 cents a bushel." The company says, "We will haul it for 3 cents a bushel; but to the point beyond at which there is competition we must haul it for 2 cents a bushel, because our competitor will haul it for that price." Now, does it injure the people who previously have paid 6 cents a bushel to get their coal hauled at 3 cents? If it does, how does it injure them?

Mr. CRISP. That, Mr. Speaker, is a plausible statement. It is, however, based upon the inquiry, which I think an erroneous test, "What is the work worth to the shipper?" I maintain the question should be, "What does it cost the transporter?" That is the difference between the proposition made by the gentlemen and that insisted upon by this committee. You ask "what are certain services worth to the shippers?" What is it worth to the man halting along the highway to meet a conveyance which will carry him out of the storm and the darkness to a place of shelter? If you ask what it is worth to him, it may be worth all that he has. But is that the reasonable rule to apply in fixing the compensation of a corporation established for the public good and not solely for the private benefit of the corporators who have it in charge?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is not the case I put by any means.

Mr. CRISP. I understood the case put by the gentleman to be that of a railroad company, who say to the people in a certain locality, "You have been paying 6 cents a bushel for hauling; will you not agree to give us 3?" Does not that question look to what it is worth to the people who receive the service, and not to the cost to the transporter?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; for the company that builds the road takes into consideration when building it what competition there will be, what the local traffic will be, what the through traffic will be—it takes into consideration all the circumstances which go to fix the price. And I say, instead of the man at the intermediate point being injured, he saves 3 cents a bushel; and ultimately, according to the experience we have had in this country, he may save still more. He is not injured by reason of the fact that the company run their cars 10 miles beyond, to a point where, in order to compete, they must make a lower charge.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] before he resumes will allow me to make one suggestion. He referred in the case he put to the rate between New York and Atlanta as compared with the rate between New York and New Orleans. He said that the railroad companies were charging 75 cents a hundred from New Orleans to New York, and a dollar a hundred to Atlanta, which was not half the distance.

Mr. CRISP. A little more than half.

Mr. SCOTT. A little more than half. Now the gentleman must remember that the competitor with the railroad from New Orleans to New York is the Atlantic Ocean. Steamships plying between New York and New Orleans fix, to a certain extent, the rates between those two cities. By the competition of the railroads from New Orleans to New York, these ocean rates are kept down. Your bill proposes to drive these railroads out of that competitive business; and such a policy must result in placing the entire control of the business between New Orleans and New York in the hands of the steamships, while the only satisfaction the people of Atlanta get is that possibly the people of New Orleans are compelled to pay eventually a dollar a hundred for transportation from New Orleans to New York, whereas if they were allowed the competition of the railroads that business might be done for 75 cents a hundred. "Misery loves company."

Mr, CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I confess I can not see, as suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], that the effect of this proposition will be to increase the through rates unless the present through-rate system is based upon a rule which requires the local shippers to sustain the loss incurred on the through rates. If the charge from New York to New Orleans of 76 cents pays a small profit to the railroad company, I ask again, what kind of a profit must be paid for a haul which is half the distance, when the charge is 33⅓ per cent. more? We do not seek, as I was going on to say, to establish any pro rata arrangement of so much a mile. We agree by this bill that the companies may charge, if it is reasonable to do so, as much for the short haul as for the long haul, and no more.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Is not the proposition of the bill designed to meet a case of this kind: Between Covington and Memphis, a distance of 37 miles, the charge for transportation of cotton is $1.15 a bale, but from Memphis to New York the charge is only 90 cents, and it passes over the same line?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if it were not going over a subject already exhausted, I could occupy an hour in bringing to the attention of the House actual cases which have arisen in the transaction of business by interstate carriers which would shock the sense of justice of any man who feels that the public has a right to demand absolute equality in transportation rates.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But do not the other sections of the bill correct that, leaving no necessity for an arbitrary law fixing a rate without reference to circumstances?

Mr. CRISP. If my friend will pardon me, I must go on. I will say to him, however, that the other sections of the bill are designed to do that, but in view of the fact that some court, some jury, somebody charged with the execution of this law might think it the intention or design that more should be charged for the shorter than the longer haul, we, by a provision inserted in the bill, give the decision of the legislative branch of the Government, that in no case, except it be a special one, can such a rate be reasonable or just. That is the purpose of the provision referred to.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman; but in reference to this question, whether these charges for freight pay or do not pay the railroad companies for hauling, I want to ask him the simple question, whether the people of this country are complaining that within the last ten or fifteen years freights have been reduced from 2½ cents per ton per mile to less than 1 cent—to seven-eighths of 1 cent?

Mr. CRISP. My good friend from Pennsylvania will pardon me for not replying fully, as I have already occupied so much time. I will say, however, that this is not the first time I have heard the claim set up that the railroad companies are entitled to great credit for having during the last twenty years reduced their rates.

We are told by gentlemen representing the railroads that this reduction of rates is a mere matter of grace to the people, who should rise up in thankfulness therefor; and figures are presented to show how much greater the incomes of the roads would have been if they had maintained the rates of twenty years ago. To be truly grateful we must believe that all the advance and progress made in machinery and cars used for the transportation of freight are for the benefit of the railroads and not for the public. Such a proposition denies to the public the saving derived from the use of the discoveries in steam appliances. It denies to the public the advantage of the reduction in the price of steel. It denies to the public the benefit of the reduction in the price of everything that is necessary to sustain life. It denies to the public and claims for the railroads all the benefits arising from a general reduction in the value of all property and is entirely indefensible.

I do not wish to be understood as underrating these corporations as a means to advance civilization and promote the general welfare; but I do mean to enter a protest against the claim that under any sort of rule they would have a right to maintain charges of twenty years ago when everything else has diminished in value, and to mildly suggest that perhaps they have not been altogether so generous in reductions as their advocates would have us believe. Has the reduction of local rates on any line of railroad in the United States been as great during the past twenty years as the reduction in the price of clothing, as the reduction in the price of sugar, as the reduction in the price of shoes, as the reduction in the price of cotton, as the reduction in the price of almost every article which humanity uses? I grant you at the great competing centers reductions have been made; but I submit that an inspection of the tariffs of corporations will show that there has been no commensurate reduction at intermediate points.

For what purpose do the people of Pennsylvania grant to a company the right to build a railroad on the territory of the State? What is the object of the grant? Is it because somebody not living in Pennsylvania may be benefited by the road? Is not the paramount object the benefit of the people who own the soil? Is not that the primary object? Are people living along the line of this great road—people dependent on that means of transportation—are they to be charged with burdensome rates in order that the railroad may obtain freight at a point some distance from it?

I say the true policy of a railroad is to build up shippers along its line. At last on them it must depend for its life. The contrary policy must result in breaking down those upon whom the road must depend for support. It depreciates the value of property along the line. It diminishes population and defeats, in every way, the object and purpose of the public in authorizing the construction of the road.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a single question.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. McKINLEY. I would be glad if the gentleman from Georgia would give the House an example which would realize an exception to relieve the carrier from the operation of this act—if he can give us an example in practical business which would justify the commission in making the exception that is provided for in the last clause of section four.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I should not like to undertake to do that, but I will say very frankly, speaking my own views, the other House conferees not being present can not speak for themselves, nor can I speak for them. I was of the opinion the general rule ought to be that in no case should a greater charge be made for a shorter distance than was made for the longer one when the shorter is included in the longer. That is my own opinion about it, but in deference to the sentiment which existed in some breasts that there might be a hardship in an iron-bound rule, believing as I do the commission organized under this act would be slow to relax the general rule, believing that in nearly every case, if not every one, it would be found the enforcement of the rule would work no hardship, I agreed to this provision. I had another reason for agreeing to it, one that always has weight with the practical legislator. I had to do it to get an agreement between the conferees of the two Houses.

Mr. McKINLEY. What particular case?

Mr. CRISP. None were cited. I understand it to be like this: Here is a universal rule which we propose to establish. There may possibly be a case, though I confess I can not see it, when the enforcement of this rule would work a hardship to a transportation company, and out of abundance of caution, to do no injustice, whenever a complainant can establish that in a specific case the operation of the general rule would be unjust in that particular case the commission may relieve him from the operation of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Georgia be extended.

Mr. BYNUM. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. I thank the House for its courtesy and indulgence.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would be glad if my friend from Georgia would allow me a question here before he proceeds with his remarks.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the word "cases," in the fourteenth line of the fourth section, in your judgment, refer to shipments or to roads?

I refer to the use of the word in connection with the proviso:

Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property.

Mr. CRISP. In my judgment it applies to shipments.

Mr. HEPBURN. If I believed that I would not vote for your bill.

Mr. CRISP. I should be sorry to lose the support of my friend from Iowa. I do not want to be misunderstood in the answer I have given. I think that it applies to shipments in this sense, that all like cases on that railroad should be operated under the same rule.

Mr. HEPBURN. Would it divert the gentleman from his argument to permit me to give an illustration of the point I mean, and then ask his opinion in connection with it?

Mr. CRISP. I would be glad if the gentleman would wait a moment, as I prefer to get through as soon as possible with my remarks, and think I may perhaps answer the point to which he refers in the course of the discussion.

There are only one or two other points, Mr. Speaker, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. That exception, or authority to suspend the rule, was granted by the committee and put in upon the idea that there might be conceivable cases where injury or injustice would result, and hence we would give power to the commission to relieve them.

The next section that has excited comment is that which prohibits the pooling of rates. I take it for granted that every member present knows what is meant by the words "pooling rates." The railroad companies, or their representatives, or rather the leading representative of the system of pooling, object to that term as offensive, and say that a very great amount of misconception exists in the public mind on the subject of pooling, largely resulting from the unfortunate use of that term; and suggest in lieu of it that it is a system for the "maintenance of rates and traffic unity." That is what he calls the system which we seek to prohibit in this bill.

Pooling, Mr. Speaker is a device—and of course I do not use that word in any offensive sense—on the part of independent monopolies to build up and maintain one great monopoly. It is a device to defeat competition; and when they talk of the "maintenance of rates and traffic unity," they mean that railroads that were built to give the people the benefit of competition shall be united with each other by this new device, so as to make them practically, for rate purposes, one line.

We have heard much of the importance to the general public of stability of rates, and I agree that it is important. We hear much said in defense of this system, and the allegation is made that it is merely a system to preserve and maintain regularity of rates and prevent railroad wars. A significant fact in this connection is that in no case on record, I undertake to say, can you find where two railroad companies have pooled their local rates. Wherever the railroad is omnipotent, so far as the shipments are concerned, wherever they can put upon the shipper any rate suggested by their cupidity or avarice, or suggested, if you please, by the other rule so lauded by these gentlemen what the freight will bear, in every such case you find each road standing by itself and making no pool.

Therefore I aver the object of pooling is to destroy competition. You may present it in any light you choose, call it by any name you please, that is its object and it never was discovered until the competing lines, which had been built for the public interest, were requiring these corporations to transport for the public at such reduced rates that they were not making what they thought they ought to make. I maintain, sir, that the railroad business, or the business of transportation, is no exception in one respect from any other business, and that is that it is to the interest of the public to have competition.

While it is true that under the railway system as it exists to-day it seems that railroads will not quietly submit to competition, yet I suggest that is the fault of the railway companies and not of the public. Here is a line of railway extending from Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, to Macon in the same State. If investors conceive the idea that the business of that line is sufficient to justify another, they go to the Legislature, which represents the people, and ask the right to build the line, they ask that the State exercise and grant to them the right of eminent domain in order that they may acquire a right of way. What is the inducement to the State to grant the charter; is it not that the people may have the benefit of competition and thus perhaps get better and cheaper rates? Unquestionably this is so.

The Legislature that grants to the corporation a charter that enables it to transact its business represents the public and grants the franchise only for the public good, to wit, that the people between the two points shall have the benefit of competition. That is true everywhere where there are competitive lines.

What is the effect of pooling? It is to defeat the object of the Legislature. It is to defeat the interest of the public. It is to place those lines in the same condition that they would be if one great railway magnate or great railway corporation should become the owner of both lines. Gentlemen who sustain this practice say to us that if you prohibit pooling, the result will be a railroad war, that the irresponsible, bankrupt concern will reduce its rates and undercut, that the other will undercut, and one will go under, and it will be a case of the survival of the fittest. If that lamentable state of affairs should exist, it will be the fault of the railway companies themselves, who will not brook that legitimate competition that every other enterprise has to bear; but even if this dire result should occur, then, Mr. Speaker, we would be in no worse condition than we are to-day, where the effect of the pool is practically to make one line.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the gentleman if the clause in section 4 will not have a tendency to prohibit these rate wars? If they put down the price of freight at a terminal point they will be compelled to put it down all along the line, and no road can afford to engage in such a war with section 4 in the bill.

Mr. CRISP. There may perhaps be some tendency of that sort; but to me it occurred that there could be no justification looking to the public interest for a practice of this sort. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not an uncommon thing in a State for the Legislature to provide that such and such a railroad company shall not own or operate another. In my judgment one of the wisest things a State Legislature could do in granting a charter would be to provide that a company should not engage in any other business but the business of transportation, and that it should not acquire the ownership of any other line. Why not? There is nothing in this bill, you understand, that prevents traffic arrangements by which continuous carriages are made. That is not prohibited. The prohibition is against the pooling of freights or the receipts of competitive railroads. You all know what kind of pools have existed and do exist in this country to-day.

Under the pooling system there is no inducement to the railroad company to furnish good transportation; there is no incentive to the enterprise and the energy so typical of the American character. They go into the pool, and, according to the agreement, so you receive, whether you carry a pound of freight or a million pounds of freight. The amount of money that comes in on all the roads is put into a pool. A commissioner is appointed at a great salary, paid by these railroads, and it is his duty to divide the receipts according to the agreement, one receiving five, another ten, another twenty, or whatever may be the per cent. agreed upon.

There are other kinds of pools, pools which agree that a certain railroad company not in the pool shall not have a right to ship its freight over their line. When I say it shall not have the right I mean the rate is prohibitory. They put such a rate on the competing line that the shipper can not ship over it, but must take one of the lines within the pool. They have an arrangement by which the water transportation of the country can not be used and at the same time give the people the benefit of the railway.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company, the evidence shows, has arrangements of this sort, that they will make special rates to a shipper over their road provided he will agree he will give them all his freight and will not ship a dollar's worth by water. If he will do that he will have a special rate. If he will exercise the freedom and independence and manhood that are supposed to belong to our people, then he has to pay to this creature of the public an increased price for his transportation.

They have had pools by which railways in the city of Chicago agreed to pay to a single live-stock firm in that city $15 for every car-load they carried for anybody; and in consideration of that the firm was to "even up" according to an understanding they had. He was to "even up;" that is, the firm was to give each railroad the amount of transportation that according to the bargain it was to have, not according to the public demand, not according to the choice of the shipper, but what they in their magnanimity or wisdom thought was satisfactory or sufficient between themselves, and they directed where your cattle would go and where yours would go, and you would be bound to ship them in that way.

That is another kind of pool they have had in this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to break up that system.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask the gentleman whether they do not have these pools abroad or some similar arrangement?

Mr. CRISP. I have heard that they do.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is upon the principle of total depravity. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. There are some very remarkable things in connection with that which, if I had the time, I might relate. I would suggest, however, to my good friend from Massachusetts in passing that the system abroad can hardly be compared fairly to the system in this country in view of the difference in the circumstances. But the point we make is that any system or practice which tends to destroy competition is an injury to the people who must use the roads.

Why is it not so? Can any good reason be given? The only reply made by the railroads is: "If you do not allow us to pool we will compete, and our competition will be ruinous; we will ruin ourselves if you do not stop us!" Why can not they compete legitimately as people do in other business? We think that they ought to do so, and therefore we prohibit pooling.

By the terms of this bill we create a railroad commission, and I ask the attention of gentlemen interested for a few moments to that point.

I say with the utmost frankness, that, as an individual, I preferred the bill without the commission, but I say also in the same breath that I am not to be classed with those who will not take anything unless they can get all they want, and that, with all respect I submit, must be the attitude of those gentlemen who oppose this bill because of the commission. What are the powers of that commission? In particular cases, under the fourth section of the bill, they may relax the rule therein set up. As to other matters, they may require the railroads to make returns of their accounts, their stocks and bonds, their running expenses, rates of charge, &c.

Where the complainant invokes their authority they may pass upon a given case between the individual and the railroad company. When they so pass upon the case their finding upon the facts is prima facie true. They have no power to give vital force and effect to their judgment, but it is prima facie true in the courts of the country. Is there anything in this power that is alarming or dangerous to the public? Is there anything in this bill that should lead representative men, men who have had large experience in public affairs, to say that nowhere in this country are to be found men of power enough, men good enough, men honest enough to administer the law?

I should be ashamed, sir, of my people if I believed in any such theory as that. I should be ashamed to come before the country and state that I did not believe it was in the power of the President of the United States, with the concurrence of the Senate, to select men wise and upright and honest enough to carry out this law. I am not one of those who believe that human nature is so utterly depraved that we can find nobody left who is honest and upright. What other powers are there than those I have enumerated?

Mr. Speaker, we do not drive the complainant to the Railroad Commission. If he chooses to go there he has the right to go and invoke this power which is created by the Government for his protection; but if he prefers, for any reason, to go to the courts of the country, they are open to him. The same judge who passes upon his rights of property, his rights of life and liberty, will there pass upon his rights in his dealings with the railroads.

Objection is made by some gentlemen who are, in the main, friendly to this bill, because we have not conferred jurisdiction upon the State courts to hear and determine these questions. Waiving for the present the question of our power, by an act of Congress, to give to the courts of a State jurisdiction to try a matter of this character—a statutory case—waiving that, I say to those gentlemen that if we had insisted upon putting that provision in this bill, we would have had no agreement. Under the bill as it stands no great injustice or hardship can arise to the citizen.

He can go to the commission, but if he is one of those who, either from suspicion or for any other reason, believe that this commission will not do right, then he can go into court and file his suit and have it tried as every other case is tried, the only difference being that it is proposed by this bill to allow to such an individual in every case of recovery a reasonable attorney fee, to be taxed by the court. That provision is, I admit, an exceptional one, and some complaint has been made of it as a hardship.

The answer I make to that complaint is, that, on the one hand, is the humble individual, the small shipper; while, on the other, is the great corporation with its wealth, its employés, and its power. To put them upon something like an equal footing we say to the poorest man in the land, who feels that he has suffered a wrong at the hands of one of these corporations, that he shall be enabled to test the question before the courts; we say to him, if you prove to have been correct in your judgment as to the wrong inflicted upon you, then we will enable you to enforce your rights by paying the counsel that you employ for that purpose. Is not that fair enough? Are we to be told that because we do not provide that these matters may be tried and determined in the State courts we leave the railroads free to discriminate, and that they are still permitted to go on in their oppression of the people?

I commend this idea to those gentlemen who base their opposition upon that ground.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the other provisions of this bill relate to the powers——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will it interrupt my friend if I ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. Not at all.

Mr. CALDWELL. In the proviso of the fourth section power is granted to this commission to make exceptions under the long-and-short-haul clause. That was my great objection to the original Cullom bill, because I believed such a grant of power ought never, under any circumstances, to be given to the commission or anybody else—a power to make some and break others. Now, will my friend tell me the difference between the clause as contained in the bill agreed upon by the conference committee and the original grant of power to the commission under the Cullom bill?

Mr. CRISP. From the Cullom bill, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman will find by turning to it, these words are stricken out, "and from the same original point of departure or to the same point of arrival." Those words were stricken out because, in our judgment, they put a limitation upon what we understand to be the rule that in no case should a greater amount be charged for a shorter than a longer haul. With that language in the Cullom bill implied that there might be cases where a greater charge might be made for a shorter than a longer haul. By striking out those words we made the rule general that in no case could such a charge be made, no matter what the point of departure or the point of arrival might be.

As the gentleman understands, a practice exists among the railroad companies by virtue of which, at competitive points, freight received over one line goes cheaper than if received over another. Now, with those words in, there would always be a question in regard to the point of departure or the point of arrival. With those words stricken out, the law is general; and that was the sole object in making the change.

The Senate bill provided that the commission might make general regulations exempting common carriers from the operation of that rule. We restricted that by requiring it to be done only in special cases after examination. That is the only difference between the two sections, as I understand.

Now, the only power of the commission after that is to require publicity of the rates of the railroads, to require them to make return of the amount of their stocks and bonds. Gentlemen all recognize the importance of a provision of this kind. One of the great troubles in the way of ascertaining to-day what is a reasonable charge by a common carrier is the fact that stocks are watered, and it is hard to find out what is the actual cost of a railroad.

Watered stocks, bonds issued for speculative purposes, all these enter into the present computation of the railroad companies in fixing the sum upon which they must earn a reasonable interest. The object of the publicity required in this bill is that when resort is had to the courts, when you appeal to the enlightened conscience of an intelligent jury, they may understand exactly the cost of the plant and the cost of transportation, so as to determine what is or is not a reasonable charge. The bill provides that you can search at law the conscience of every officer of a railroad. You can force him to disclose any fact connected with transportation. If the fact is such that it would expose him to criminal indictment, then we provide it shall not be so used against him. If it is a mere question affecting damages, then of course it may be used; and it enables the suitor to get his case fairly and fully before a jury.

There is one other provision to which I call attention, and then I shall close. As I said at the outset, nearly all the provisions of this bill are to be found in the common law. One of the great purposes we have in view is to aid the common law by providing a penalty for its violation other than the penalty of damages. At common law a trespass or a wrong gives the party aggrieved the right to sue and recover damages. We propose to say that, in addition to the common law liability, any transportation company violating this law shall be liable to have its officers indicted, and if found guilty they shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000.

If gentlemen will examine the bill they will observe that it is framed in such a way as to declare certain practices unlawful. Turning to the penal section of the bill, you will find that if a common carrier shall be found guilty of doing anything in this act forbidden, or failing to do anything in this act required to be done, the officers of the company may be indicted in the district courts of the United States, and if found guilty may be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000. This provision was intended to aid the common law. It was designed for the protection of every individual, no matter how humble, who may be wronged by the act of these corporations.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the bill. It is not, as I have already said, exactly as I would like it. It contains one or two propositions which I would be glad to have out; and there have been omitted from it one or two propositions which I would like to have in. But taken as a whole, I commend this bill to those Representatives of the people who believe that wrong is being done by these corporations, who believe that the murmurs of the people all over this country do not come to us except as the expression of some injury perpetrated upon them by transportation companies.

To those gentlemen who desire to make the assertion of the power of the Government to control these corporations I commend this bill, and ask them to sustain it. The practices which it condemns are unjust to the people. An honest investigation of the rights of the railroad companies and the people would forbid them; and in my judgment such practices, and the arguments by which they have been sustained, amount to an absolute assault upon public justice.

I believe in the paramount right of the people. I would not harm the railroads. I would allow them to pursue their legitimate calling, but I would bear in mind always the rights of the people. In my judgment the bill I now commend to you protects and preserves all the rights of the railroads, while at the same time it gives some modicum of relief to a long-suffering and oppressed people. [Loud applause.]

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION CENTENNIAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As a matter of national interest, and one solely within the discretion and control of Congress, I transmit the accompanying memorial of the executive committee of the subconstitutional centennial commission, proposing to celebrate on the 17th of September, in the city of Philadelphia, as the day upon which, and the place where, the convention that framed the Federal Constitution concluded their labors, and submitted the results for ratification to the thirteen States then composing the United States.

The epoch was one of the deepest interest, and the events well worthy of commemoration.

I am aware that as each State acted independently in giving its adhesion to the new Constitution the dates and anniversaries of their several ratifications are not coincident. Some action looking to a national expression in relation to the celebration of the close of the first century of popular government under a written Constitution has already been suggested, and whilst stating the great interest I share in the renewed examination by the American people of the historical foundations of their Government, I do not feel warranted in discriminating in favor of or against the propositions to select one day or place in preference to all others, and therefore content myself with conveying to Congress these expressions of popular feeling and interest upon the subject, hoping that in a spirit of patriotic co-operation, rather than of local competition, fitting measures may be enacted by Congress which will give the amplest opportunity all over the United States for the manifestation of the affection and confidence of a free and mighty nation in the institutions of government of which they are the fortunate inheritors and under which unexampled prosperity has been enjoyed by all classes and conditions in our social system.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 18, 1887.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would suggest, as that contemplates the invitation of the South American Republics, whether it would not be more properly referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House the whole question heretofore has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. All right, then.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. 10793) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLIN. All points of order are reserved.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think it is necessary for me to say that I feel just as much interest in conserving the rights of the people of this country as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] or any other gentleman. I am against wrongs done by railroad companies as I am against wrongs done by individuals, and with the gentleman from Georgia I am ready at all times to act in the direction of protecting one against the other.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, there has been a series of misfortunes attending legislation on interstate commerce from the date of the introduction of the first bill down almost to the present time, or down, at least, to the close of the first session of this Congress. I am extremely sorry that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] is not present to-day, because I must state this fact that from the time of the introduction of the first bill from the Committee on Commerce down to the period of the taking up of this bill in the House last July things have been done which I would not have done. This bill was taken up then against a promise made that it should not be touched until the beginning of this session of Congress.

And last of all, when the committee of conference was appointed on the disagreement of the two Houses no member of the minority on this question of that Committee on Commerce, no member of this House who was in the minority on this question, was placed on that committee of conference among the conferees of the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS], the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHNSON], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM], not to speak of myself, were members of that committee in that minority which reported on this subject, and voted for the Cullom bill when offered by Mr. Hiscock as a substitute, and all of whom voted against the Reagan bill when it was passed by the House. Yet, sir, not one of that minority was placed upon the committee of conference. So I say this conference report came into this House without the approval of one of the minority of the Committee on Commerce, because not one of them was placed upon the conference committee.

And I say, moreover, that in the report of this conference committee, using the parliamentary language applicable to such reports, that necessarily and logically there has not been that "full and free conference" on the subject as has been stated in the report to the House and Senate on the bill.

Now, why that was done I do not know; I do not stop to inquire. It could not have been defended upon the ground that one of a minority of the political divisions of the House was put upon the conference; but for some reason unknown to me every one who was selected for the conference had favored the Reagan bill, and voted for it—I mean of members of the Committee on Commerce—and the minority was not represented at all. What disadvantage that may have been to the House when the report now before us was being considered in the conference I do not want to say, nor do I undertake to say. It may have been no disadvantage. I say that I regret very much that Mr. REAGAN is not present to-day.

I do not mean to say that it is not legitimate and proper in him to be in Texas to try to obtain what he wants, for I think it well that every man should make known what he wants in that direction; and I only express my regret for his absence; but do not find fault with him on account of it, nor do I reflect upon him for being absent. It was not with that view that I made the remark.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me to ask if he does not know it is customary in appointing conference committees on the part of the House to appoint gentlemen who represent the measure—who are favorable to the bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir.

Mr. CRISP. And does not the gentleman know that the Senate conferees were all in favor of the Senate bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I do not know. I can not answer that question; but my understanding is, and has always been, that one of the three conferees shall represent the minority view.

Mr. DUNHAM. And especially when there is a minority report from the committee.

Mr. CRISP. I am very sorry that I have never heard of this grievance before.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that he could have taken care of the Cullom bill in conference better than Mr. CULLOM himself.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, and I will answer it directly and pertinently. I believe, sir, that I—and I will mention myself, as the gentleman has referred to me—I believe that I or any other member of the minority of the Committee on Commerce would have had as good a chance of persuading Senators to adhere to the Cullom bill as the gentleman from Texas or the gentleman from Georgia had of persuading them to incorporate in their report certain clauses of the Reagan bill.

I do not profess to have the obstinacy and great persistency that seems to be the moving power with some gentlemen, and I will name among them my friend from Texas, who is absent, and I say again that I am sorry for his absence to-day, because he has been most persistent in his views on this question. But I have, sir, somewhat of persistency myself in my character, and I never yield until the absolutely inevitable comes. I would not yield upon a question of this kind merely to meet what I call the demands of persons who are asking legislation they do not understand, and the effects and consequences of which they have not taken time to consider. I believe that any one of the four gentlemen who made the minority report on the bill from the Committee on Commerce would have been able to have withstood the power of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce over the wills and senses of the conferees, if I may be allowed to make that statement. I am glad, therefore, the question was asked, because I would not like to have referred to it myself unless the question had been asked.

Mr. CRISP. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Was the gentleman from Pennsylvania present when the conferees were appointed on the part of the House?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; and I have heard that was given as a reason why I was not put on the conference. It was told me by a member of the House at the time that on account of my not being present when the conference was appointed I was not made a conferee. I was present when the conference was appointed, and voted on a roll-call by yeas and nays ten or fifteen minutes before it was appointed, and on another roll-call ten or fifteen minutes afterwards. I was present when the appointment was made, and went away that afternoon about fifteen minutes after four o'clock—went away knowing that the committee had been appointed.

Mr. CRISP. I had no information except that the gentleman was absent. I did not know myself the facts.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That is another thing I did not intend to mention. I was here. I should not have mentioned that if I had not been asked. Are there any other questions? But let me say before leaving this point that not only was I present, but so also were Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, who had united in the minority report.

However, Mr. Speaker, we have this conference report before us now. It has come down to us now and here as a practical point that this House has got to decide upon one way or the other. In my view we have to vote down or adopt the conference report. I wish there were power in the House to recommit it, for I know the majority of this House desires to pass some legislation to control railroads. I know that and feel it, and I myself would to-day vote for the Cullom bill as I did before, and am only amazed, if I can refer to it under the rules, to find in another body of this legislature sitting at the other end of the Capitol that those sustaining that bill were meager indeed in number, while it had been passed in the same Senate a few months before by a large majority, and in accordance with the wishes of people in many parts of the country as expressed to us by joint resolutions of State Legislatures, by the action of boards of trade, by the action of chambers of commerce, and by the action of other commercial associations known by different names.

I am going to begin perhaps at the wrong end, because it is natural for us to look to our own localities and homes; and I shall incorporate in my remarks and adopt the suggestions as my own and ask the Clerk to read these resolutions of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, which were passed last night. I speak of that board of trade as an association of gentlemen of the highest integrity and of the greatest commercial importance. It is a board known everywhere, and I believe is the oldest organization of the kind in this country. I ask to have these resolutions read; and as they seem to embrace almost every point on which I ask for a vote against the report of the conference committee, the reading of them will shorten my remarks very much.

The Clerk read as follows:

The memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia respectfully represents:

That your memorialists favor the passage of a bill by Congress under which a supervisory power shall be exercised through a board of commissioners over the interstate commerce of the country, and approve of the general provisions of the bill which has just passed the Senate of the United States, in that it prohibits all drawbacks and preferences, the effect of which shall be to create an unfair or unjust discrimination in favor of any particular person or locality, and also in that it secures the open publication of the rates upon such traffic, and also gives the commission the aid of the proper law officers of the United States, and of the processes of the courts to enforce their decisions upon any questions that may be brought before them.

But your memorialists beg to protest against the fourth section of said bill, known as the "long and short haul clause," under which any carrier is prohibited from charging or receiving "any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance." That this provision of the bill would, in the judgment of your memoralists, largely cripple and embarrass the movement of through traffic between the East and the West, and would result not only in increasing the cost of the necessaries of life to the consumer in the East, but would also reduce the value of grain, provisions, cotton, tobacco, and other staples to the producer in the West and South.

That as the interstate railways are mainly dependent for their revenue upon their local traffic, and as such a provision would compel them to accept for the transportation of such local traffic a sum of money not exceeding the proportion of the gross charge to which they would be entitled on through traffic, they would as a matter of inevitable necessity, be compelled either to reduce the rates on their local traffic to such a point as to bankrupt themselves and make them unable to meet their fixed charges, or to charge on the through business the same rates that they do upon their local traffic. That the effect of this would be to prevent such through traffic from being exchanged between the East and the West for the reason that the rates on through traffic are largely fixed over the entire country by the competition of water routes; and as the railroads, in order to get any portion of the through traffic, are compelled to approximate their rates to those charged by the water routes, they are necessarily obliged to accept on this through traffic a compensation but little in excess of the cost of carrying the same. That in the judgment of your memorialists, no injury results from this course on the part of the railway companies, but, on the contrary, as it not only furnishes cheap flour and other provisions to the laboring classes of our own country, but also enables an enormous volume of provisions, cereals, and other staples to reach the seaboard and thence by ocean transportation the markets of other countries, and there meet on favorable terms the products of other parts of the world, thus placing the balance of trade in favor of the United States and making it a creditor of other nations rather than their debtor. That anything which prevents the free and unrestricted movement of this traffic must work a most serious financial injury to the producer, consumer, and transporter.

They therefore beg of your honorable body to so amend the bill referred to as to remove or modify the objectionable section known as the "long-and-short-haul clause," believing that in making the request they are acting in harmony with the views expressed by a majority of the commercial organizations of the entire country.

Your memorialists also beg to protest against the fifth section of the bill referred to, which prohibits what is known as pooling by the railway companies. Your memorialists believe that the effect of pools has been to secure uniform rates to shippers and prevent discriminations between individuals; but they recommend that all pool agreements between the railway companies should be submitted to the board of interstate-commerce commissioners, and that none should be valid until so submitted and approved by said board. That in this manner only such agreements as are fair and just to all interests, and would secure the public against unjust and unfair discrimination would be sanctioned and approved; and that with the power vested in a board to approve only such as in their judgment are fair and just, the railways would be able to enforce these agreements, and prevent the reckless destruction of property which has been caused in the past by what are known as railroad wars. That in this manner, also, a fair rate would always be secured on the through traffic of the country, and while no charge would be levied upon it which would interfere with its free movement, or in any manner check the development of the West and South or the general prosperity of the United States, such a revenue would be derived from the through traffic as would prevent any imposition by the railways of unjust charges upon their local traffic.

Your memorialists therefore urge upon your honorable body the recommittal of the said bill to a conference committee for the purpose of amending the fourth and fifth sections thereof as already stated.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

[SEAL.]

FRED. FRALEY,
Vice-President.
J. P. TUCKER,
Secretary.

PHILADELPHIA, January 17, 1887.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia to the House of Representatives, protesting against the passage of the interstate-commerce bill in its present shape, and asking your honorable body to recommit the said bill to a conference committee for purpose of amending the fourth and fifth sections thereof.

Yours truly,

J. P. TUCKER, Secretary.

Hon. CHAS. O'NEILL,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, while on this subject I will state here that the National Board of Trade, composed of representatives from all the boards of trade of the country—I presume from all the boards of trade of the country and the chambers of commerce, &c.—met here during the pendency of the Reagan bill in the course of one winter and were here again last winter; and they advised Congress not to pass the Reagan bill, and especially not to pass some of the very features of this conference committee's bill. This National Board of Trade is meeting here to-day or to-morrow. I do not want to foreshadow what they may do, but in my opinion they will pass a resolution asking this House to hesitate before it adopts the conference committee's report and the bill, and will advise against at least some provisions of it.

Why, sir, my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has changed his line very much. He did not vote for the Cullom bill. He might have voted for the Cullom bill, which had in it the provision for the appointment of a commission. He might have voted for that bill, and I never understood why he did not do it, being a gentleman of very conservative views.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me a remark? Am I to understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as thinking that this bill is the Cullom bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I only wish it were. I am amazed to find it is not the Cullom bill, and I believe it would have been the Cullom bill if there had been a proper representation of the views of the minority of this House on the conference.

Mr. CRISP. Of course, as I was one of the conferees, I can make no reply to that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Of course the gentleman understands that the Cullom bill has the commission clause in it; but I suppose something had to be yielded on the question of the courts. There was the trouble, and the provision now creating this commission makes it almost a court. It does not make a trial by jury exactly, but it makes the commission almost a court, and makes the proceedings almost similar to proceedings in courts. There will be delay in decisions upon the question of short and long haul, and not the practical general rules as contemplated in the Cullom bill. The proposition in the Cullom bill as passed by the Senate, and as voted for by 102 members of this House against 126 against it, was for a commission, but did not in itself create any of the delays that the bill now reported does. It meant that there should be a speedy settlement of these questions of long and short haul, and that general rules should be made—not a long investigation, as it is supposed will be had under the provisions of this bill.

As I believe in the knowledge and experience of the commercial associations of the country, I want to refer to them again after I have alluded to the concurrent resolution passed by the Legislature of Iowa favoring the passage of the Cullom bill regulating interstate commerce, a resolution passed by both branches of the Iowa Legislature, sent to this House and presented by a member from Iowa, I think Mr. HENDERSON, and copies presented by other members of that State. And so were resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis.; so also of the association entitled the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Company, of Cincinnati; so also the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Paul, and so on. They have come here from nearly all the great centers of trade.

I might refer also to the many, many editorials which appeared at the time when the report was made, and the many, many editorials which appear now that could be selected from the papers of the country urging the House to adhere to the Cullom bill and not to vote for the adoption of this conference report and the passage of the bill recommended by the conference committee. I speak for instance now of the Louisville Courier-Journal; I speak of one of the Cincinnati papers; I speak of the North American of the city of Philadelphia, and various other papers well known throughout this country giving this advice to the House now. I presume gentlemen read their local papers at least and learn the feeling expressed by editors; for we are so much dependent upon the information we receive through the channel of newspapers that the views of the press ought to have influence on the House.

I refer more particularly to commercial associations. They are composed of men engaged in business, men who understand all about these questions of transportation, men who have no desire to crush the railroads, who do not wish to disturb the rights of the individual citizen, but who do, on the contrary, wish to see the progress of the railroads continued in the direction of conforming their charges to the demands of the people. Does any gentleman dispute that progress? I have heretofore asserted, and it cannot be denied, that within a comparatively short period the average charges have fallen from 2½ cents per ton per mile to about seven-eights of a cent per ton per mile. I take it that such legislation as this is calculated to retard railroad progress and to interfere seriously with the movement of freight—especially freight at points far distant from the seaboard. Hence I find myself unable to subscribe to legislation which, in any iron-clad way, interferes with the right to charge less per ton per mile for the long haul than for the short haul. I do not believe that legislation of that character is good legislation.

I think it will inevitably disturb, greatly, the interests of the transportation lines and, of course, disturb, at the same time, the interests of the people, who desire cheap and rapid transportation, and to whom it is as advantageous as it is to the railroads. Any one who looks at the record of the proceedings upon this bill in the body at the other end of this building can see plainly that many a gentleman who voted for it doubted whether he understood what he was voting for. [Laughter.] Many gentlemen who voted for the bill admitted that they did not understand the operations of some of its provisions, and some who voted against it made the same admission. [Renewed laughter.] I was very glad of the compliment paid to my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], a member of the committee of conference. I refer to the fact that there was a correspondence between him and a member of the Senate as to how the gentleman from Georgia understood certain provisions of the bill.

That was a very gratifying compliment, a distinguished Senator asking information from a member of the House! [Laughter.] I thought it a very high compliment to the House and to the understanding which the Senator knew the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to possess and his ability to explain, as well as he could [laughter], the provisions of this bill. I do not think it detracts at all from the ability of the gentleman that he is not able to explain all its provisions. I do not wonder at it. Nobody in the Senate who asked for a satisfactory explanation of the bill received it, and nobody here has received such an explanation. But that is not the question. I fear, and I think I can perceive, that many gentlemen will vote for this bill without understanding what it will result in. They think that the pressure has been so great from the country that there ought to be some bill passed upon this subject. Now, I do not see this day where the great pressure from the people is to be discovered.

I admit that there is occasionally a locality where there is complaint about the railroads and from which there is a pressure for the passage of some bill; but, take the great producers of the country and the great shippers of the country, is there any pressure here from them for the passage of such a bill as the one which has passed the Senate and is likely to pass the House? Some years ago, I admit, there were complaints and there were reasons for complaints of the railroad corporations, but to-day those reasons have largely disappeared. In the great State of Pennsylvania I do not know where to find a complaint on the part of shippers against the railroads. I recollect when there used to be complaints, but I do not know of any there now, and I believe the same is true of other States to a very great extent.

The fact is that the building of railroads has been of such immense advantage to the country that the people are willing to let the men who understand the railroad business manage it themselves.

Mr. ROWELL. If the gentleman will permit a question, does he not think that the legislation which has been enacted in twenty-six States and Territories, and which has been in operation for several years, has had a good deal to do with reducing the complaints and the grounds for complaint?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes; I do not doubt that. Several of the States have enacted laws creating railroad commissions, and undoubtedly those have had great effect, and there, perhaps, is where this power had better be left, for there is less danger from this question in State legislation than in National legislation, less danger of injury to the people as well as to those who have their means invested in the transportation lines. Railroad commissions have been created in Massachusetts and in other States, and they have been to a great extent successful in removing the grounds of complaint against the railroads.

The legislation of the State of Pennsylvania, the constitutional provisions adopted by that State, have done good. Pennsylvania is against discrimination; her Legislature is against it, her people are against it, everybody there is opposed to discrimination. My colleagues know that as well as I do. We could not stand up here and favor anything looking like discrimination and be considered representatives of our people.

Mr. WEBER. Have you a railroad commission?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. We have no such commission in Pennsylvania. I only wish we had. I think we would be in a fair way of getting such a commission but for this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the railroad companies, so far as I know, appear to be totally unconcerned on this question. I know nothing of them; and I hear nothing from them. I do not know that their representatives are here; I have not seen any of them. Some of these companies may like some of the provisions of this bill, as I do; and some of them may differ with me in my ideas in regard to this bill. But I do not know and do not care how they feel. I have had my convictions upon this subject for years; and I feel to-day more strongly convinced than ever that we should be very careful how we legislate in this general way by passing an almost iron-clad bill. I do not regard the bill as now recommended by the conferees as an improvement upon the Cullom bill. I regard the long-and-short-haul clause in its present form as so very binding that there can be no redress.

I have thought all along that the shipper and the railroad company could agree as to what would be "similar circumstances." So they could. They have agreed in the past, and they could agree now. I do not think legislation upon that question is required. I know that since we passed the "Reagan bill" in the House, the freights charged by the railroad companies have been diminishing in a slight degree, as much as could be expected when you take into account what should be a fair profit to the railroad companies and what accommodations should be extended to the shippers of freight. It is not to be supposed that a railroad company wants to carry freight at a loss.

Those companies are generally looking to the interests of their stockholders; they generally seek a return upon the capital they have invested. I think their great desire is to make their investments yield a profit. But when you come to consult with those who understand the financial affairs of the railroad companies you find that, while the aggregate of reductions for transportation is so great, the trunk lines are generally paying dividends upon their stock, and all of them are paying interest upon their bonds. There must be some profit, even if some man in Minnesota gets his freight carried from Saint Paul to the East for less than is paid by some one a few miles east of Chicago.

This question of profit is a very material one; and the railroad companies desire to make a profit for those whose interests are under their care. It is not necessary to mention the fact—the whole House knows it—that nearly eight billions are invested in railroads. The aggregate is largely more than the aggregate invested in almost any other line of business; and this business employs a larger number of persons than almost any other branch of industry. Why, sir, the progress of railroad building in the State of Pennsylvania has made that State a great empire in itself. It has increased within my recollection from a Commonwealth of a little over 2,000,000 people to a State of nearly 6,000,000 inhabitants. The development of our railroad system has built up our State almost like a continuous city from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, as well as in other directions where railroad lines have extended.

Our State entered early upon the working out of the railroad idea; earlier almost than any other State. Our Commonwealth was almost the pioneer in railroading. Before any of these other great lines of railroads were completed the State of Pennsylvania had crossed the Alleghany Mountains with a railroad by means of inclined planes—a wonderfully skillful feat of engineering in those early days—so as to connect the waters of the Delaware with the waters of the Ohio, partly by rail and partly by canal. But the misfortune was that those lines of canal were managed by a canal board, as it was called in Pennsylvania, which became a powerful machine of political corruption. When I reflect upon some of the provisions of this bill and the views of some gentlemen here upon them the idea suggests itself to my mind that eventually the Government may be asked to purchase these roads. They may be pushed upon the Government of the United States for the purpose of bringing value to some bankrupt railroads and for the purpose of centralizing the railroad system and using that system politically. There is danger in that direction; for I believe such is the tendency in the minds of those who have for years been so eager to adopt legislation even more stringent than that proposed in this bill.

Another consideration suggests itself to me. What protection have we in this bill from the railroads in Canada? Can my friend from Georgia explain that? What protection have the trunk lines of this country as against the trunk lines of Canada? The gentleman does not answer. I will give the answer. Of course it is well known that there is a line of railroads running through Canada from Montreal in the direction of Chicago, and beyond to the northwest, competing to a considerable extent with trunk lines running from our seaboard in the same direction. There is nothing in this bill which binds these roads; nothing at all. But an attempt has been made to bring them within the power of this enactment and to require them to stand by some of its provisions. I do not believe that can be done by legislation. The great competitor of the American trunk lines is in Canada, where they can do everything they want to do, where they can adopt one charge for a long haul and another for a short haul, just as they may please to do against our roads. There, of course, another interest comes in.

Then, there are the water-ways of the country. Why are not they legislated for in like manner? Take the steamship lines upon the lakes, take the steamboat lines on our rivers, and they are nearly all combinations of various people, they are nearly all associated lines, and why not by legislative authority in like manner control the rates of their freights as you do in the case of railroad corporations? Yet, while it would seem that should be done in one case as in the other, there is nothing in this bill bringing them within its provisions. All the restrictions are put upon the railroad corporations, and the transportation on our water-ways is allowed to remain as it is, and these steamship and steamboat lines are permitted to make charges for carrying freight as they please, to undercut—to use the customary phrase—as much as they please, the charges of railroad lines. They can pool freights, and do pool them. They can charge as it suits them for a long or a short haul. While railroads are charged with attempts to defeat this interstate-commerce legislation, we must not forget the influence that the water-ways may be exerting for the success of such a measure as we have before us.

As I have said before in this House, our great care should be as to how we are legislating, and upon what assumption, and upon what condition of facts. Some gentlemen say whatever may be wrong here we can remedy hereafter, that we have the power of amendment. We have the admission that this is an experiment. I should think so by the vote at the other end of the Capitol, and by the remarks there. But we are told, let us try it. Well, we may try it to the ruin of the transportation business in the approaching spring of this year, and next fall. We can not legislate in reference to the matter for another year, and so we can not remedy any defect which may be found in this law in less than that time. We are now going into the business of this year—the spring trade is about to open, and the enactment of such a law must lead to embarrassment in the transportation lines of the country at least for months to come. I do not see how it can be otherwise. I know there is a provision in the bill that this law shall not take effect until 60 days after its passage. I believe there is such a provision.

Mr. CRISP. They are to have 60 days.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Sixty days in which to make the necessary changes relating to a business which covers the whole country—which, in extent, may be counted not only by the use of thousands of miles of railroads, but by over a hundred thousand of miles. There are one hundred and twenty-five thousand and more miles of railroads now built, and five or six thousand miles of railroad are built every year. They have been built at that rate, and are being built at that rate this year. Yet, in this bill it is proposed to enact a law to throw that whole railroad system into embarrassment. It overturns the system which they have been years in establishing, and which has had the effect of reducing the rate of transportation to the lowest figures, cutting it down at the average rate of reduction in the past in a few years of the future to less than seven-eighths of a cent per ton per mile, the average rate now the country over.

I will say this, that in the years I have been permitted to live and permitted, by the pleasure of the people who sent me to this House, to occupy a legislative capacity, I remember the inception of the great railroad movement in Pennsylvania, and I am proud to say, after looking into the matter carefully, I rejoice that I acted with those in favor of such legislation as would provide by municipal subscription in Philadelphia millions of dollars to build the great Pennsylvania Railroad in order to connect the Delaware with the Ohio. I know something of its enterprise. I know what it has done for Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, and I think I know that in the opinions I have here expressed upon the provisions of this bill I represent the people who sent me here. They would be satisfied with the Cullom bill. I know I represent them on this subject when I vote against a proposition containing so many iron-clad provisions and so radical when we consider that we are enacting an entirely new national system of railroad management.

I would be glad to vote for the Cullom bill, as we voted for it last summer, in favor of a grand national commission, and the legislation proposed in that bill that would, I believe, cure all evils as commissions have cured evils in many of the States. Let such a bill be put forward, and let such a commission be appointed by the President. Let the commissioners be selected because of their integrity and known ability, and let them look into the matter and see what is necessary to be done to protect the people, what is necessary to restrain the railroads. I believe in a few months' time such a commission would furnish us with such information as might be necessary and upon which we could legislate with safety.

I am going to end what I had to say by repeating, as I began, that I am against discrimination. The people are against discrimination and I am for reasonable freight charges. I am for no man being preferred over another in the transaction of business with the railroads, or in any other character of business; and so I am ready as I ever have been ready to act upon reasonable and desirable legislation on the part of Congress to make any proper and legitimate change in the railroad system. This House is not likely to vote down this report; and yet it seems to me that it is a dangerous experiment, and what its effect will be upon the great transportation movement of the country is what no man can predict. Whether it will be for good or bad the future alone will determine. Whether the railroads will suffer or not—and when I speak of railroads I mean the people who have $8,000,000,000 invested in them—or whether the business people will be made to suffer is difficult to determine. I want neither the business people nor those whose means are honestly in railroad investments to be the losers by our enactments. I say it is a dangerous experiment and one which should be proceeded with in a cautious manner. The majority must rule and must be responsible for what it does.

I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, disguise it as we may the fact exists that the members of this House must meet and settle the question whether the people of this country are to have any legislation during this Congress on the much-vexed and much-talked interstate-commerce law to regulate and control the transportation of goods over the great railroads which span the land in every direction. The bill which has been reported by the conference committee, after a most elaborate, able, and exhaustive debate in the Senate, has passed that body by a vote which certainly must be gratifying to the distinguished Senator who is chairman of the Senate committee that had the bill in charge. The consideration of the bill here naturally suggests two leading thoughts: First, has Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce in the manner proposed in the bill? And, secondly, does a necessity exist for the exercise of that power if it shall be found to be warranted by the Constitution and the decision of the courts?

The power of Congress to legislate upon this subject and the constitutionality of the bill under consideration were seriously questioned by some of the ablest and most distinguished Senators, and the same objections are again heard in this House in opposition to the passage of the bill.

I confess it seems a little strange to me that after the wealth of learning shown upon this subject by State and Federal judges, including the learned justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, that there should still be found doubting Thomases among the members of this House or in the legal profession wherever found. If there is any question in the whole domain of our jurisprudence which has been fixed and settled by an unbroken line of decisions of the courts from the earliest history of our constitutional Government to the present, it is this of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce or the commerce contemplated in this bill.

Chief-Justice Marshall, away back in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, reported in the 9th of Wheaton, examined this whole subject, and in a most luminous opinion asserted and demonstrated this power of Congress. And in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States recently given in the case of the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railroad Company vs. The People of the State of Illinois, Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language:

> This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution. * * * The argument on this subject can never be better stated than it is by Chief-Justice Marshall, in Gibbons vs. Ogden. He there demonstrates that commerce among the States, like commerce among foreign nations, is necessarily a commerce which crosses State lines and extends into the States, and the power of Congress to regulate it exists wherever the commerce is found.

To those who, like the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD], hold that railroads do not come within the meaning and intendment of that clause of the Constitution giving to Congress the right and power to regulate the transportation of goods from one State to another, and that railroad corporations partake more of the nature of private property, and should be treated as private and not public enterprises, I would commend the following language of Mr. Justice Bradley in giving expression to the views of the minority of the court on the questions involved in the Wabash case, already referred to:

The highways in a State are the highways of the State. Convenient ways and means of inter-communication are the first evidence of the civilization of a people. The highways of a country are not of private but of public institution and regulation.

In modern times, it is true, government is in the habit in some countries of letting out the construction of important highways requiring a large expenditure of capital to agents, generally corporate bodies created for the purpose, and giving to them the right of taxing those who travel or transport goods thereon as a means of obtaining compensation for their outlay. But a superintending power over the highways and the charges imposed upon the public for their use always remains in the Government. This is not only its indefeasible right, but is necessary for the protection of the people against extortion and abuse. These positions we deem to be incontrovertible. Indeed, they are adjudged law in the decisions of this court. Railroads and railroad corporations are in this category.

This language is plain and unequivocal. It settles the power of this Congress to act in the premises. In other words, it holds to the axiom that the creature can never be greater or more powerful than the creator. This question of the power of the Government to regulate and control railroads, in one form or another, has been litigated in and decided by the courts of last resort in many, if not all, the States of the Union. Powers once conferred upon these corporations have been tenaciously held and enlarged upon. The Dartmouth College case has been invoked in their aid again and again. But to the honor of the judiciary of our country, both State and Federal, be it said, the judges before whom these questions have been brought for final arbitrament between the people and the railroads have arisen to the demands of the occasion, and by their learning, their integrity, and their patriotism have held and demonstrated that State Legislatures and Congress can not invest corporate bodies with power more imperial than that exercised by the State or with authority which becomes "vested rights," and hence amenable to no subsequent legislation. They have held that the people are sovereign, and that all, of whatever station or condition, corporations and persons alike, must bend to their will when expressed.

So I think, Mr. Speaker, with power and authority so full and ample possessed by Congress this House can not hesitate upon that ground to consider and pass the pending bill.

That there is a necessity for some such legislation I think is apparent to all who have given the subject any thought and study. The railroads of this country, with an aggregated capital almost beyond the computation of man, possess a power over the commerce of the country and all kinds of industry truly regal. That power has not been always exercised to promote the greatest good to the greatest number; but has been used to still further enhance the power of the railroads and increase their wealth and that too to the detriment and even ruin of the individual and sometimes of whole communities.

I cannot stop here and now to illustrate this truth by numerous examples. They are known to all men. The farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer has each his grievance and story of wrecked fortunes from unjust discriminations in railroad transportation. That this is not idle talk is shown from the fact that the legislatures of twenty-three States of the Union have passed laws prohibiting unjust discrimination and other railroad abuses within the limits of their respective territories. But the State is powerless to meet the evils sought to be remedied by this bill. This is happily illustrated in the Wabash case to which I have already made reference.

There is a statute in the State of Illinois which holds that if any railroad corporation shall charge, collect, or receive for the transportation of any passenger or freight of any description, upon its railroad for any distance within the State, the same or greater amount of toll or compensation than is at the same time charged, collected, or received for the transportation in the same direction of any passenger or like quantity of freight of the same class over a greater distance of the same road, all such discriminating rates, charges, collections, or receipts, whether made directly or by means of rebate, drawback, or other shift or evasion, shall be deemed and taken against any such railroad corporation as prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination prohibited by the provisions of the act.

The statute provides a penalty for every offense. That statute was attempted to be enforced against the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railroad Company by the State authorities on the following state of facts: The railroad company charged Elder & McKinney 15 cents per hundred pounds for carrying a load of freight from Peoria, in the State of Illinois, to New York, 109 miles of the distance being in Illinois, while at the same time it charged Bailey & Swannell 25 cents per hundred pounds for carrying a like load of the same class of freight from Gilman, also in the State of Illinois, to New York, 23 miles of the distance being in Illinois. Both places were on the line of the road, and the freight of Elder & McKinney being carried 86 miles further in the State of Illinois than the like kind of freight of Bailey & Swannell. The Wabash road defended the action brought against it, and asked the trial court to hold the following to be the law of the case:

The court further holds as matter of law that the transportation in question falls within the proper description of commerce among the States, and as such can only be regulated by the Congress of the United States under the terms of the third clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

The court refused to so hold, and found that the facts recited constituted a violation of the statute, and imposed the penalty provided by the law for such unjust discriminations. The company appealed to the supreme court of the State, and there the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. The precise ground upon which the Illinois court held jurisdiction of the case can best be expressed in the language of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court. The court say:

We understand and simply hold that in the absence of anything showing to the contrary a single and entire contract to carry for a gross sum from Gilman in this State to the city of New York implies necessarily that that sum is charged proportionately for the carriage on every part of that distance; and that a single and entire contract to carry for a gross sum from Peoria in this State to the city of New York implies the same thing; and that therefore when it is shown that there is charged for carriage upon the same line less from Peoria to New York (the greater distance) than from Gilman to New York (the less distance), and nothing is shown to the effect that such inequality in charge is all for carriage entirely beyond the limits of this State, a prima facie case is made out of unjust discrimination under our statute occurring within this State. We hold that the excess in the charge for the less distance presumably affects every part of the line of carriage between Gilman and the State line proportionately with the balance of the line.

If this wise and just interpretation of the Illinois statute had been adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States there would be less necessity for the enactment into law of the pending bill. But the company refused to abide by the decision of the supreme court of Illinois, and brought the case for review before the Supreme Court of the United States, where it was reversed and remanded. Mr. Justice Miller, in giving expression to the opinion of the court, said:

Of the justice or propriety of the principle which lies at the foundation of the Illinois statute, it is not the province of this court to speak. As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the State, it may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the State Legislature, to determine that question.

But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of States a principle of this kind, and each one of the States shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates, or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the States and upon the transit of goods through those States, can not be overestimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and can not be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think this is clear from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

This opinion renders all the States powerless to check or control the growing sovereignty of railroads. The great bulk of the traffic of the various roads comes within the principle announced by Mr. Justice Miller, and hence Congress, and Congress alone can protect the people from extortion, discrimination, and other railroad corporate abuses. It is contended by some that the railroads should not be hampered by any legislation and that they will see that no injustice or extortion is practiced upon the people. That the officers and managers of some of the great railroads of the country are just and honorable men can not be denied, and that they manage the affairs of their roads in a spirit of fairness to the public must, too, I think, be admitted.

But that is no argument against the right or propriety of passing such a law as is contemplated in this bill. They possess a power which, if they choose to exercise it, will spread ruin upon the person or locality that offends them. They have not the responsibility or interest of a government in the people. Their interest in the welfare and prosperity of different individuals or communities may be only incidental, while the government is always direct; and yet, without any interstate-commerce law to regulate and control them, they are more powerful and exercise a more direct influence upon the people than the State. Their power for evil is well illustrated in the building up of the Standard Oil monopoly. It has been fittingly characterized by one author as "The History of a Commercial Crime."

My time is limited and I can not speak at any length upon a condition of affairs brought about by the combination and discriminations of railroads which would permit a giant monopoly to accumulate $100,000,000 in a little less than fifteen years. The history of the manner in which that company has been enabled to accumulate so vast a fortune is enough to make the members of this House, who are the representatives of the people, hasten the work of this conference committee into a law. The people look to the members of this House as their agents to honestly, fairly, and fearlessly guard their rights.

The railroads and their managers and agents profess to be friendly to Congressional legislation, and some even go so far as to maintain that it is in the interest of honest railroading to have Congress enact a law regulating the transportation of traffic over interstate roads, and I incline to the opinion that many of the leading railroad managers of the country are honest in the expression of these views; but the bill now before us has been attacked in a manner which, if we were to assume the criticisms to be just, would lead us to believe it the most villainous piece of legislation ever attempted to be forced through Congress. I have studied its provisions with much care, with no prejudice against railroads, and with a desire to fairly and intelligently represent the interests of the people who have honored me with a seat in this House and the interests of our common country. My study and investigation have led me to different conclusions respecting the bill than those of the prophets of ill omen whose forebodings picture the utter destruction of all commerce among the States and gaunt want and despair upon every corner if the bill becomes a law.

I assert what can not successfully be denied, that the sections of the bill which are so fiercely assailed are but the enactment into statutory law of common law principles. The mode of enforcing those sections are different from common law remedies—made so to meet a condition of affairs which was not contemplated at common law. I am not saying that the bill is perfect or that it could not be improved by amendment, but that is denied us. We must take the bill as it comes from the conference committee or reject it. The fourth and fifth sections of the bill seem to be most objectionable, or at least the opposition to the bill is centered upon those sections.

Section 4 makes it unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of the act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included in the longer distance with a proviso that in special cases the commissioner appointed in the bill might permit a less charge for a longer than for a shorter distance for the transportation of passengers or property, with the saving clause that these provisions should not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of the act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance. What is there in this section so novel as to cause such a furor of debate over its provisions? The principle is as old as the law of common carriers.

That its application to the regulation and control of railroads and their traffic is not new is apparent from the fact that four States, namely, Arkansas, California, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, have that principle in the constitutions of their States, and Massachusetts and Illinois by statutory law have emphasized its justice and equity. Able and eloquent men like my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], men who can make the worse appear the better reason, may torture the language of that section into something detrimental to the commerce among the States; but, after their brilliant assaults shall have spent their force, plain people will see nothing in this section but the assertion of a just principle of law, made necessary by the unjust discriminations and extortions of railroads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OATES in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have some time remaining. I have not occupied thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman for the fifteen minutes remaining in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRISP. How much additional time does the gentleman want?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not intend to occupy more than thirty minutes if I can avoid it.

Mr. CRISP. I ask consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed with his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I had intended to supplement these remarks by an examination in detail of the various sections of the bill, and especially of sections 4 and 5, but the lateness of the hour forbids such an extended examination, and I shall content myself by referring briefly to a few of the important points in connection with them.

The construction which has been placed on section 4 by the conference committee of the Senate avoids all of the difficulties raised by gentlemen who oppose the bill on account of its provision relating to the so-called long and short haul.

That construction will secure to the farmers and shippers of Illinois and the West as favorable rates for through freight, otherwise known as the long haul, as they have now; while under the provisions of the bill all shippers at intermediate points on the line of the road or roads forming the line over which the long haul shipments are made will be protected from unjust discriminations or extortion.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who presented to the House this afternoon the reasons which actuated the conference committee in agreeing upon the bill in the form we are now considering it, spoke of the disastrous results to the commerce of the country, and shippers, and the people generally from a war of rates between two or more of the great trunk-line railways at competing points, such as Kansas City, Omaha, or Chicago, for through freight to New York city, or some other seaboard city. What the railroads lose by such wars at these terminal points, it is claimed, are imposed upon the people and shippers at intermediate points on the line of the roads between their Eastern and Western termini, so that the people are the ones upon whom finally the great burden falls. Now, by this section of the bill, provision is made that the charge for the shorter haul on such a line shall not be more than for the longer haul, except in special cases, and whatever the rates at the terminal points of such competing roads may be reduced to all the intermediate points will get the benefit of such reduction. This fact will serve as a most effective check upon the hostilities of competing railroads, and secure fair and uniform rates.

The final construction which will be placed upon the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" must of course be left with the courts and the commission. Any construction given to them by a member in debate can not be authoritative or binding. They are placed in the section to give such flexibility to charges on the long and short haul as will not interfere with the commerce of the country. Railroad managers who were examined before the Commerce Committee of the Senate all agreed, it is said, that as a general proposition, as much should not be charged for the transportation of passengers or freight on any railroad for a short as for a longer distance. This section then is in harmony with the views of expert railroad men. The exceptions mentioned by them before the Commerce Committee of the Senate are provided for by the powers given the commission to authorize a less charge for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property.

Mr. REED. Then you differ with the gentleman from Georgia in that interpretation?

Mr. HOPKINS. I am not the keeper of the conscience or of the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia. I am simply giving my construction to this bill.

Mr. REED. And which differs from that of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOPKINS. That may be.

Mr. REED. I wish to draw attention to the divergency.

A MEMBER. Why is the commission authorized to sit in Washington?

Mr. HOPKINS. That is a question I can not answer. Washington is the seat of the National Government, and it would seem proper that the meetings of the commission should be here. But the bill provides that the commission shall go to Chicago or Cincinnati, or anywhere else.

Mr. STEELE. At the expense of the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. But in the interest of the people.

Section 5, which relates to pooling, is but a re-enactment of the common-law principle. It seems to me there is no member of this House who will maintain that it is right or just to permit railroad companies to engage in pooling when it is a violation of the interests of all other industries. It is an offense at common law, and has been so decided in the State of Ohio and in the State of New York, and has been so decided wherever the question has been fairly put to the courts.

I am aware that railroad managers claim it is in the interest of cheap freight rates, but it will be difficult to make any man believe that such combinations benefit anybody other than those who are parties to them. Had I the time I would gladly show the results of the pooling contracts prohibited by this bill. But I am reminded that my time has expired. The bill, Mr. Speaker, may be crude, and experience may teach us that it should be amended and modified. If such be the case no person will more cheerfully correct by further legislation any errors or defects in the bill than myself. The railroads of the country have worked wonders in the settlement of our Western States and Territories and in the development of our interstate commerce, and I would not knowingly strike down any of their legitimate rights or cripple them in carrying on this great commerce. What, for one, I wish to do, and what I think the members of this House wish, is to so regulate them in the transportation of passengers and freight from one State to another that they can work no injustice upon each other or the public, and that reasonable rates shall be secured to all classes of shippers and those engaged in the transportation of goods for a short or long distance over any of their lines. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Illinois has any time left or not. The present occupant of the chair understands that the floor was yielded to the gentleman from Illinois by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], and that when his time expired, on the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], it was extended.

A MEMBER. Until he had finished his remarks.

The SPEAKER. And having done that, the Chair thinks the gentleman has no time remaining.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 10242) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, and moved that the House non-concur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are there not some amendments which ought to be concurred in?

Mr. BRAGG. There are only two that are of material consequence.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the managers of the conference on the part of the House, Mr. BRAGG, Mr. VIELE, and Mr. STEELE.

S. D. BARCLAY AND OTHERS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10794) for the relief of S. D. Barclay, G. D. Adams, and William H. Kimbrough; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2478) granting a pension to John Wines;
A bill (S. 2459) granting a pension to Eliza Wilkins;
A bill (S. 2420) granting a pension to Sidney Denton;
A bill (S. 2388) granting a pension to Alonzo Raymond;
A bill (S. 2167) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Dunlap;
A bill (S. 1654) granting a pension to Joseph Mays;
A bill (S. 1642) granting a pension to William F. Harmon;
A bill (S. 391) for the relief of A. A. Thomas;
A bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky;
A bill (S. 250) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Ashuelot;
A bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton;
A bill (S. 1386) for the completion of a public building at Fort Scott, Kans.;
A bill (S. 2791) to provide for an American register for the steamer Nuevo Moctezuma, of Philadelphia, Pa.;
A bill (S. 230) for the erection of a public building at Worcester, Mass.; and
A bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth S. de Krafft.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ERMENTROUT, indefinitely, on account of the death of his brother.

Mr. CRISP. I move that the House do now adjourn.

STABLE FOR HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES HORSES, ETC.

Mr. OWEN. Before the question is put on the motion to adjourn, I desire to call up a bill, which is of interest to the whole House. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the use of the offices of the House of Representatives, and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the sum of $4,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, to be expended under Edward Clark, Architect of the Capitol, for the construction of a brick stable and wagon-sheds necessary, and fence inclosing the same, for the post-office and other offices of the House of Representatives, to be erected on the lot on the east side of Third street between Maryland avenue and B street southwest, in the city of Washington, now occupied by and the property of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the power of objection is exhausted I want to know where this bill came from.

Mr. OWEN. It was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. OWEN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons used by the officers of the House of Representatives, find that the present stable quarters are unsatisfactory and inconvenient, and that $360 rent per year is paid therefor. The bill asks the construction of a brick stable at a cost of $4,000 on a site owned by the United States, said site being a part of the south annex to the Botanical Grounds; if is unoccupied, and this use having been recommended by the superintendent of the grounds, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is this for the horses used for carrying mails and the like?

Mr. OWEN. That is the object of the bill. The writ of ejectment from the present premises has already been issued, and it is necessary that this bill should pass at once.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OWEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. 1171) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8346) authorizing the employment of mail messengers in the postal service, in place of Mr. MAXEY, excused.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MAHONE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. RANSOM the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7616) for the relief of W. D. Havely.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 10665) to provide for the investment of certain funds in the Treasury in bonds of the United States was erroneously referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Inasmuch as it relates to the bonded debt of the United States, it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, and it will be so referred if there be no objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOUND: Petition of citizens of the city of Lebanon, Pa., in favor of repealing internal-revenue tax on tobacco and cigars, domestic spirits and alcohol, &c.—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. A. J. WARNER: Petition of the officers of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Ohio in favor of the Blair bill.

By Mr. MILO WHITE: Petition of the chairman and secretary of the national legislative committee of the Knights of Labor in favor of the Blair educational bill.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 19, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a supplementary report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the private land claim designated as the "grant to Bernabe M. Montaño et al. No. 49;" which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 6, 1887, certain information relative to the indebtedness of the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the communication.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not necessary to read the communication in full. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD, and also in the ordinary way, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if there be no objection.

The communication is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1887.

SIR: I am in receipt of Senate resolution of January 6, 1887, calling on this Department for information as to the sums of money which were owing to the United States by the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies, respectively, on the 1st day of January, 1887, with details of all payments made on account of the same; and also as to the sums which are due and to become due, principal and interest, under existing law, severally and collectively, from said companies, and what difference will result to the Treasury if Senate bill 1200 should become a law.

In reply thereto, I have the honor to state that the amount due from the several Pacific railroad companies for interest paid by the United States to January 1, 1887, on subsidy bonds issued to said companies was $70,854,325.62, of which there had been repaid by the companies at that date the sum of $21,552,144.14, leaving due on account of interest the sum of $49,302,181.48.

There will be due on the same account at maturity of the subsidy bonds, September 11, 1897, the further sum of $43,406,921.88, making a total of $92,709,103.36 due and to become due on account of interest. There is also to become due on account of principal of these bonds at maturity the sum of $64,623,512, making an aggregate indebtedness due and to become due of $157,332,615.36.

In response to the inquiry as to "what difference will result to the Treasury if Senate bill 1200 should become a law?" it may be stated that the special method prescribed by the bill for obtaining the constant annual payment is one which, while proposing to find a constant semi-annual payment adequate to extinguish both principal and interest of the indebtedness of the companies, is insufficient to cancel even the interest, being sufficient to provide for the payment of only eleven-twelfths of the interest.

The present worth of the indebtedness of the companies as of October 1, 1886, ascertained as prescribed in the bill, is $110,978,100.28, the semi-annual interest on which, computed at 3 per centum per annum, is $1,664,671.50, while the constant semi-annual payment required to be made under the provisions of the bill is only $1,525,948.88.

The constant semi-annual payment, or bond of indebtedness, required to cancel the present worth of indebtedness above mentioned ($110,978,100.28), principal and interest, in eighty years, computed at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, reinvested semi-annually, is $1,834,063.98.

A careful analysis of the subject has been made by Mr. E. B. Elliott, Government actuary, whose report is herewith transmitted, and to which the attention of the Senate is invited for further particulars.

Tabulated statements showing the amounts due and to become due from each of said companies, respectively, on account of interest and principal, together with the details of reimbursements made on account of interest by transportation and cash payments, are also transmitted herewith.

In conclusion, I may add that section 8 of the act of May 7, 1878, establishing a sinking fund for the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies, commonly known as the "Thurman law," provides:

"That said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies, respectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States, and for the claims of other creditors, if any, lawfully chargeable upon the funds so required to be paid into said sinking fund, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to the principles of equity, to the end that all persons having any claim upon said sinking fund may be entitled thereto in due order." * * *

In view of this provision of law, it may be proper to consider whether the sinking fund now held in trust by the United States should be treated as an offset in determining the indebtedness due the Government from the railroad companies mentioned, as is required by the first paragraph of section 1 of Senate bill 1200, now under consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING,
Secretary.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 13, 1887, reports of engineer officers relative to the channel in the part of Lake Champlain which lies between the islands of North and South Hero; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD GRANT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PLUMB, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. WALTHALL as the conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MANDERSON presented the petition of James E. Boyd, mayor, and 212 other citizens of Omaha, Nebr., praying for a reduction of the special taxes, and for the repeal of the "obnoxious and prohibitory features" of the oleomargarine bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of George Ross & Co. and other citizens of Lebanon, Pa., and the petition of McKinley & Harbison, druggists, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of internal taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of citizens of Easton, Bethlehem, Allentown, Media, Orbisonia, and Kittanning, in the State of Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania generally, praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Thomas P. Gilchrist and 128 other citizens of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for a reduction of special taxes and for the repeal of the "obnoxious and prohibitory features" of the oleomargarine bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of Guilliame Autson and 52 other citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Mrs. James Bennett, of Richmond, Ky., praying for an equal protection of the United States, with other persons, in what the fifteenth amendment defines as "the right of citizens of the United States to vote;" which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. HAMPTON presented a petition of druggists, of Charleston, S. C., praying for a repeal of the internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present sundry affidavits and additional evidence in support of the bill (S. 1669) granting a pension to Dobson Amick. I ask that these affidavits be received, and referred to the Committee on Pensions to accompany that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the papers will be received and so referred.

Mr. PLATT. I present some remonstrances of citizens of Middletown, Conn., against the removal of the custom-house from Middletown to Hartford. They are addressed to me as a Senator but intended for the Senate. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Commerce, and I desire for the present, therefore, that they shall lie upon the table. Perhaps some motion to recommit will be made and if the bill is recommitted the remonstrances will go with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be laid upon the table.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia residing in the suburb of Washington known as Meridian Hill, praying that an appropriation be made for paving and other public purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of George L. Davis and other citizens of North Andover, Mass., and a petition of David William Wallwork and other citizens of North Andover, Mass., praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1049) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, to report it without amendment.

By direction of the committee, I give notice that to-morrow morning, after the dispatch of the usual morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of Henry A. Paus, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 533) for the relief of Henry A. Paus, moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3088) to grant a right of way through the public land strip to the Chicago, Kansas and Western Railroad Company, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 3174) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1875, granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands to the country known as the Public Land Strip; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, appropriating $50,000 to enable the United States to take part in the international exhibition to be held in South Australia June 20, 1887, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations, with the accompanying papers; which was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1776) for the relief of Faran & McLean, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Miss Clara G. Scott, praying for relief on account of services during the late war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHENEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2053) for the relief of Rachel J. Floyd, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2935) granting a pension to Robert Baxter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1622) to prohibit any officer, agent, or servant of the Government of the United States of America to hire or contract out the labor of prisoners incarcerated for violating the laws of the Government of the United States of America, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 961) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of LeVert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was directed by resolution of the Senate at the last session to inquire into the subject of the alleged ill-treatment of American fishermen and fishing vessels, &c., to report a bill from that committee on the subject.

I have also a written report which I am directed by the committee to submit, together with documents, papers, evidence, &c., but which I crave leave to submit a little later. The report has all been drawn up and considered and agreed to, but I am authorized to go over it again in the sense of editing it, to see that the punctuation, &c., is right. I ask leave, therefore, to submit the report a little later, to-day or to-morrow, as the case may be.

The bill (S. 3173) to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice, under the authority of the committee, that just as soon as the bill and report shall be printed, so that Senators can examine them, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill and proceed with it, and dispose of it at the earliest possible day.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: Pursuant to the leave of the Senate granted this morning, I now report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a written statement of our views concerning the fisheries question together with a considerable number of documents, maps, &c., which I shall send directly to the Secretary's office to save bringing them in here. I move that the report and accompanying papers be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The documents will be printed, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the use of the offices of the House of Representatives; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BRAGG, Mr. VIELE, and Mr. STEELE managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 165) for the relief of William H. Gray, of Kentucky;

A bill (S. 230) for the erection of a public building at Worcester, Mass.;

A bill (S. 250) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Ashuelot;

A bill (S. 391) for the relief of A. A. Thomas;

A bill (S. 1386) for the completion of a public building at Fort Scott, Kans.;

A bill (S. 1642) granting a pension to William F. Harmon;

A bill (S. 1654) granting a pension to Joseph Mays;

A bill (S. 2167) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Dunlap;

A bill (S. 2388) granting a pension to Alonzo Raymond;

A bill (S. 2420) granting a pension to Sidney Denton;

A bill (S. 2459) granting a pension to Eliza Wilkins;

A bill (S. 2478) granting a pension to John Wines;

A bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton;

A bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth S. de Krafft; and

A bill (S. 2791) to provide for an American register for the steamer Nuevo Moctezuma, of Philadelphia, Pa.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 3175) granting an increase of pension to Sallie R. Alexander, widow of Lieut. Col. Thomas L. Alexander, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMPTON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3176) to promote the efficiency of the civil service of the Government, and to establish a retired-list for persons employed therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3177) granting a bounty of $100 to the Second Regiment, Kansas Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 3178) for the relief of Charles Murphy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ALLEN'S REPORT ON ALASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of Lieut. Henry T. Allen of his explorations in Alaska, transmitted by the Secretary of War in response to a request therefor from the Senate, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House, and 500 copies for the use of the Secretary of War.

THE YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Capt. Moses Harris, of the First Cavalry, acting superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park, made to the Secretary of the Interior October 4, 1886.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I ask to take up for present consideration a resolution which now lies on the table of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further "concurrent or other resolutions?" If not, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which comes over under objection.

G. A. GOODALE.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I ask for an order which the clerks will understand from my statement of it.

I will state that on April 30, 1874, I introduced the following resolution, which was adopted by the Senate:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of the correspondence in the cases of James Barclay against Lieut. G. A. Goodale, United States Army, late in command of Fort Klamath, Oreg., for false imprisonment, and the action of T. M. Rouse against same, and how much has been paid and what is still unpaid of the expenses of Lieutenant Goodale.

On the 6th of May, 1874, the Attorney-General, in response to that resolution, sent to the Senate a communication of that date. I ask that the papers be taken from the files and be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to be considered in connection with the claim of B. F. Dowell and the representatives of A. C. Gibbs for attorneys' fees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon will please reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. It is difficult to place it in writing, and that is why I read what I did, so that the RECORD will show just what I have asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was unable to hear the Senator, although the clerks may have done so.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I simply ask an order withdrawing the papers from the files and referring them to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

MRS. HENRIETTA M. DRUM HUNT.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. In my absence the day before yesterday, when private pension bills were taken up, one was passed over on account of my absence. I ask the Senate to take up that bill and consider it. It is the bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henrietta M. Drum Hunt, widow of the late Lieut. Henry J. Hunt, United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $40 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an inquiry. We have had a standard of pensions to widows of officers of a certain grade at $50 a month. While I have contended against it, that it is unjust to the great mass of widows in the United States who did not happen to have a little influence to enable them to get bills of that kind passed, I wish to know why the high standard set up a few years ago under the lead of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has been abandoned, slipped away from, so to speak?

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I will simply say that in this case the Senate has already acted upon the question, and passed a bill granting a pension of $40 per month, as proposed by the amendment of the Senate committee to the House bill now up. The House, instead of taking up the Senate bill, passed a bill of its own and fixed the rate at $25 a month. I desire that the Senate shall concur in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Pensions, so that the matter may go to a conference and be disposed of there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. WHITTHORNE were appointed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo. The bill will not raise any discussion whatever. It will only take a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply wish to inquire what the motion is.

Mr. VEST. It is to proceed to the consideration of the Saint Louis bridge bill. The matter has been adjusted entirely, and there will be no debate about it.

Mr. CULLOM. Adjusted by whom?

Mr. VEST. By the Senators from Iowa and——

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to know a little about what the adjustment is before the bill is passed.

Mr. VEST. I should have taken pleasure in consulting with the Senator from Illinois, but I supposed he knew all about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have the bill read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CALL. I desire to know the status which my resolution in relation to Florida land forfeiture occupies at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Florida is on the table subject to motion like any other proposition.

Mr. CALL. I wish to take up that resolution as I gave notice yesterday, in order that I may submit some observations to the Senate this morning upon it. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Missouri, but I wish it to be understood that I shall have the floor after the pending matter is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A Senator is entitled to the floor usually upon a motion to proceed to the consideration of a resolution lying on the table.

Mr. CONGER. There is an omission in line 7 of section 6 after the word "owning." It reads "owning said bridge." It should read "owning or operating," as in other sections of the bill. There is no objection I suppose to that amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to intrude on the confidential communication of my honorable friend from Michigan and the Chair, but if he will let us know what he said we should all like to hear him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan calls the attention of the Chair to some amendment.

Mr. CONGER. In section 6, line 7, the last line, it reads:

Shall be paid for by the persons owning said bridge.

In other places in the bill we have inserted the words "or operating," so as to read "owning or operating."

Mr. VEST. Certainly; let that amendment be made.

Mr. CONGER. I merely called attention to it. I move that that amendment be made to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, line 7, after the word "owning," it is proposed to insert the words "or operating;" so as to read:

Shall be paid for by the persons owning or operating said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I offer certain amendments to the bill, to which I ask the attention of Senators interested in the subject of this bridge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Senator from Missouri will be stated. Does the Senator offer them in gross, to be acted upon by the Senate in that way?

Mr. VEST. I suppose that would be the best course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of section 2 strike out the words "or passengers or freight passing over said bridge."

Mr. CULLOM. These amendments, as I understand, have been made by the committee and are considerable in number. It is pretty difficult for the Senate to understand just what the bill will be with these amendments adopted unless we see them printed. I suppose I shall support the bill as it is proposed to be amended, but I should like to see what the amendments are in print, and I should like to have the Senator from Missouri let the bill go over until to-morrow morning for the purpose of seeing just what the proposed amendments are and how the bill will be as amended. That course will delay the consideration of the bill but one day. These amendments are entirely new to me. I knew nothing about the condition of the bill until it was called up this morning.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, it has not been my purpose to hurry the bill through, but time is of very great importance to the gentlemen who propose to construct the bridge. They are here, a large delegation, awaiting the action of Congress. I am certain if the Senator will listen to these amendments he will understand them perfectly. I have conceded every point which his constituents desire. This is to be a high bridge of 500 feet span and 50 feet elevation above the surface of the river.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the elevation of the present bridge?

Mr. VEST. Fifty feet upon the Eads bridge, with one span of 525 feet.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the longest span of the present bridge?

Mr. VEST. The principal channel span in the Eads bridge is 525 feet. The bill provides for two channel spans of 500 feet each, and one additional span of 300 feet.

Mr. INGALLS. This bridge would present no more obstacles to navigation than the present bridge?

Mr. VEST. No, sir, not as much, because in this case there are two spans of 500 feet width each, and one of 300 feet width, instead of one of 525 feet width, as in the case of the Eads bridge.

In addition to that, if these three spans are not put in the bridge the company have the privilege of putting in two spans of 750 feet each, the river being only sixteen hundred feet wide. As I have before said, there is to be an elevation of 50 feet between the surface of the water and the lower portion of the structure of the bridge.

Mr. CULLOM. As I have before said, I am in favor of a bridge at the point indicated in the bill. The only desire I have is that the bridge shall be a high bridge and not be an obstruction to commerce upon the river. If the Senator from Missouri, managing the bill, and the Committee on Commerce are sure that the bill is properly guarded and contains all the requisite provisions, I shall not ask the Senate to delay it, but allow it to be proceeded with.

Mr. VEST. I can assure the Senator that there never was a better guarded bill presented in Congress. Every line and word in it has been carefully considered.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw my objection to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read through and acted upon separately afterward, if any Senator calls for a division. If not, they will be acted upon in gross.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6 of section 2, strike out "or passengers or freight passing over said bridge."

In line 4 of section 3, strike out "or" and insert "and," and strike out "five" and insert "three."

After "way," in line 5 of section 3, insert:

Provided, That said bridge may have two spans of not less than 750 feet each, clear width of channel-way, if thought best, instead of three spans, as aforesaid.

Mr. ALLISON. Now let the section be read as it will stand if amended.

Mr. VEST. Wait until we get through with all the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out all from and including the word "Provided" in line 9, section 3, down to and including the word "clear" in line 13, in the same section.

Strike out "ten" in line 15 of section 3, and insert "fifty."

Strike out all of section 3 after "bridge" in line 16.

Strike out all of section 4.

Strike out the words "and all pivot-spans" in lines 1 and 2 of section 5.

Strike out the words "as of the draw-openings" in lines 6 and 7 of section 5.

Strike out the words "draw-span openings" in lines 1 and 2 of section 6.

Strike out the words "in case a high bridge be constructed" in lines 5 and 6 of section 7.

Strike out "which" in line 14 of section 8, and insert "whose jurisdiction."

In line 3 of section 3, strike out "four hundred and fifty," and insert "five hundred."

At the end of section 13 add the following:

And it is further provided, That no bridge shall be constructed across the Mississippi River within two miles above or two miles below the bridge herein authorized.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know that I understand that language. I have given very little attention to this matter, it being wholly remote from any interest in which I have a special duty. I suppose the Senators from the States bordering on the Mississippi River thoroughly understand this matter; but, if I understand the last few lines which have been read, there is an assertion of national authority in the nature of giving a monopoly. I refer to the provision that no bridge shall be built within a certain distance of this proposed structure.

Mr. VEST. That is a usual provision.

Mr. HOAR. Is it?

Mr. VEST. We frequently do that in these bridge bills, because the Engineer Bureau are of the opinion that not more than one bridge should be at a given point. There is the Eads bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis. This bridge is to be above the Eads bridge.

Mr. HOAR. What is the effect of that proposition? Have the United States any authority to make such a stipulation?

Mr. VEST. I think so. We have entire control over the navigable streams of the United States, and we can say at any time that not more than one bridge shall be built at a certain point. I think we clearly have that power.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, I desire to say that the Senator from Missouri and myself had some consultation respecting the changes to be made in this proposed bridge charter. The only matter about which we consulted was whether a high or low bridge should be built, those navigating the Mississippi River opposing the construction at this point of a pivot-pier bridge. The promoters of this enterprise have changed their plans so as to propose only the construction of a high bridge at this point, and a bridge having two spans of clear waterway of at least 500 feet in length, and an additional span of at least 300 feet in length. That covers all that I have looked after carefully with reference to the details of the bill in the amendments suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

I understand that the amendments just read at the desk provide, in the first place, that this shall be a high bridge and not a pivot-pier bridge, and, secondly, that there shall be two spans of clear water way of at least 500 feet, and one span of 300 feet.

The provision referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, prohibiting the construction of another bridge within 2 miles of this structure, I think a wise one. Indeed I think it would be well if there was not a necessity for the construction of this bridge. I do not believe there should be a multiplication of bridges across the Mississippi River at the different points along that river. I think the legislation of Congress should so provide that these bridges across the Mississippi River shall be open to the equal use of every railway terminating on either side of the river at the point where there is a bridge, and I think it was so intended by those who have hitherto passed the laws respecting bridges. It would be better for us now, if we had the power—I do not know that we have the power—to require the owners of the present bridge at Saint Louis, known as the Eads bridge, to so arrange the tolls and charges as to allow all the transportation to pass over that bridge; but that seems to be impossible.

The requirements of commerce make this proposed bridge necessary. If it is constructed as I understand it will be constructed, it, with the Eads bridge, can provide for the entire transportation of commerce requiring the crossing of the river at that point. So this provision prohibiting the construction of another bridge within two miles is, in my judgment, a wise provision. I should be willing to extend it further so as to provide that no more bridges shall be built across the Mississippi River at the city of Saint Louis, and I think Congress should exert the power—as it surely has the power—to provide that all the commerce requiring a crossing at Saint Louis, or at any other point on the Mississippi River, should be crossed upon the bridges that are now constructed.

I do not desire to take any responsibility with reference to the details of this bill except so far as it provides that this shall be a high bridge having these wide spans.

Mr. VEST. A single word. There is provision in this bill to allow any railroad company to cross upon the bridge, and if the terms can not be arranged with the company operating the bridge, the Secretary of War is to determine the question.

The object is to erect a practically free bridge at Saint Louis. Our experience there in the case of the late strike has taught us a lesson which we never can forget. The terminus of the Eads bridge in Saint Louis was seized by one of the bands of strikers and all transportation across the river except by ferry was blocked effectually.

After that experience the people of Saint Louis determined, if possible, to make a free bridge there for everybody to cross. We are now paying $5 upon every car, loaded or empty, that crosses the Eads bridge. All our coal supply—and Saint Louis is a large manufacturing city—comes from the State of Illinois. Mr. Gould has the majority of the stock of that bridge company, the English stockholders having almost given away their interest in it, and to-day, by the last report made, you will see that it yields 5 per cent. upon $18,000,000 as net profit upon an investment which I think cost between three and four million dollars.

The erection of the proposed bridge is an absolute commercial necessity to the people not only of Saint Louis but of the entire country, because the passage of the Mississippi River is a national and not a local matter.

As to the control of freights on the bridge, by the charter of the Eads bridge, that matter was left to the Legislatures of Missouri and Illinois, each State concurring. Senators who have had experience in these matters of State legislation, where great railroad corporations and interests are involved, know that it is almost impossible to secure this concurrent action on the part of each Legislature. These parties come to Congress and propose to erect a low bridge, if found the most inexpensive, but the opposition made by the lumber men, particularly in the Northwest, induced them to change the plan.

We have conceded every point, and we now propose, if possible, to raise the money under the limitations of this bill to erect a free bridge there. That is the whole of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator from Missouri inform us whether the bill chartering the present bridge required that no other bridge should be erected within two miles of that?

Mr. VEST. No, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. Then it appears to me that in justice, if we are to incorporate in this bill a provision that no other bridge shall be erected within two miles of this, we ought to provide in this bill that this bridge shall not be erected within two miles of the present bridge.

Mr. VEST. I believe there is a limitation as to the county, but not as to the number of miles.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is more than two miles.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not.

Mr. VEST. There is a territory named within which any new bridge shall not be constructed, but I do not know the exact terms.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill reads:

And maintain the same, across the Mississippi River at some suitable point between the present Saint Louis bridge, known as the Eads bridge, Saint Clair County, Illinois, and the mouth of the Missouri River.

These grantees may construct this bridge within 10 feet, under the language of the bill, of the present structure if they see fit to do so. If we are to insert in this bill a proviso that no other bridge shall be erected within two miles of it, the existing structure ought to be protected by a similar provision, and I would suggest either that that clause be left out or that in connection with the language I have read a similar provision be inserted.

Mr. VEST. There is a provision in the Eads bridge bill, I think, which is to the effect that no other bridge shall be constructed within Saint Clair County, in Illinois, and that limit is two miles from the Eads bridge.

Mr. CULLOM. That is my recollection, that the bridge has jurisdiction so far as Saint Clair County, Illiniois, extends on the Illinois side, and the proposed bridge is just above the line of that county, I think.

Mr. VEST. This bridge is a little over two miles above the Eads bridge, and this simply repeats the provision in the charter of the Eads bridge, changing the bridge to two miles above or below.

Mr. INGALLS. But the Senator will observe that under this language there is nothing that will prevent the structure being builded within 10 feet of the present bridge.

Mr. VEST. Excuse me, I am not speaking of this bill, but under the Eads bridge charter that could not be done because it has to go outside of Saint Clair County, Illinois.

Mr. INGALLS. When I first spoke to the Senator he was not clear on that matter, but he now thinks the bill contains that provision.

Mr. VEST. The Senator asked me if any number of miles was specified in the Eads charter, and I told him no; but I asked the Senator from Illinois, and he informed me that Saint Clair County does extend up to its northern limit more than two miles from the Eads bridge, and that charter would cover the point made by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the construction of as many bridges across the Mississippi River as are necessary for the commerce between the East and the West; and I do not sympathize with the views of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who expressed the opinion that there ought to be an inhibition against the bridging of that stream. For my part I should be glad to see it arched over with a culvert from one end to the other.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kansas certainly did not understand me to say that I thought there should be no bridges across the Mississippi River. If I so said, I stated what I did not mean. I think there should be just as many bridges as the Senator would suggest are necessary.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand there is a need of additional transit across the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, in the first place, because of a corporation that is hostile to the interests of the other corporations that terminate there, so that it is impossible to obtain facilities for the transit of cars, and that also there is an absorption of terminal facilities on the Illinois side of the river, so that the necessary yard room and territory for storage and switches and sidings cannot be obtained. If that be the case, I am entirely willing that this charter should be granted; but if this structure is intended as a threat against the existing property there, if it is to be built for the purpose of destroying the value of the bridge already existing there; if it is done, as so much of this kind of work is done, as a blackmailing operation, to compel the owners of that structure there to buy it out, I am opposed to it. What is known as the New York, Saint Louis and Chicago Railroad was built at an expenditure of sixty or seventy million dollars, it may be, so far as the ostensible stocking of the concern goes, absolutely unnecessary, through a country already supplied with facilities, for the express and avowed purpose of speculation, to compel existing corporations there to buy it out, which, I understand they did at a profit of some eight or ten millions of dollars. If this is an enterprise of that sort, I am opposed to it. I should like that some assurance should be given here that it is a bona fide concern that intends to build a bridge, and not one that intends to get a charter for the purpose of putting a switch on the other corporation to bring it to terms or compel it to buy it under a threat that if it does not do so there will be a free bridge erected across that stream, which will render the present structure practically valueless.

Now, Mr. President, the fact that this proviso is omitted in this bill, that there is an attempt to put on it a declaration that it shall be protected from any competition, and that no other structure shall be erected within 2 miles above or below it on the river, and that there is no proviso here, so far as we are advised, that the structure provided for by this bill shall not run exactly parallel and within ten feet of that, and be made a free bridge, I do not think we have sufficient guarantees that there is behind this a corporation that means to erect a structure to provide the people of Saint Louis with the facilities that it is alleged they need.

I move to insert in the first section of this bill the same proviso that has been attached at the close of the thirteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] are still pending.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I withdraw my amendment until they are disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments which have been read. Shall the question be taken in gross? The Chair hears no objection, and the question will be so submitted. The question is on the amendments proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] now submits an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12 of the first section, after the word "river," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no bridge shall be constructed across the Mississippi River within two miles above or two miles below the bridge herein authorized.

Mr. INGALLS. No; that is not it. My purpose was to provide that this bridge shall not be erected within two miles of the present structure, above or below, on the river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary has read the amendment as he found it.

Mr. VEST. It is the same amendment that was put on at the end of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to apply the provision in the last section of the bill to the structure provided for in this bill; so that the Eads bridge may be protected from similar competition.

Mr. VEST. Then the language will have to be changed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is practically useless for the reason that no company would undertake to build a bridge within two miles of the present Eads structure unless they were to undertake to build a tunnel also in connection with it under the city. If it were attempted to build any bridge within the limits of the city, as the present bridge is built, the compensation for the right of way would amount to more than the cost of the bridge, and the very fact of the city being so compact above and below the present bridge precludes any company practically from undertaking to build a bridge alongside of it. I can see no necessity for the amendment, and of course no harm in it, as far as that is concerned.

I have examined the first charter granted to the Illinois and Missouri Bridge Company, and there is no limitation in that, but I have a distinct impression from the examination I have heretofore made that there is a provision somewhere against the construction of any bridge abutting on the Illinois shore up to the northern boundary line of Saint Clair County.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us have that provision read.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not in the charter, unless in some amendment to it.

Mr. VEST. My colleague will permit me. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. There is no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 12 of section 1, after the word "river," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no bridge shall be constructed across the Mississippi River within two miles above or two miles below the bridge heretofore constructed.

Mr. VEST. Add "and known as the Eads bridge."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. After hearing the Senator from Kansas, it occurs to me that the authority in the first section should be somewhat enlarged. It provides:

That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the Saint Louis Merchants' Bridge Company of Saint Louis, Mo., a corporation created by the laws of the State of Illinois, or its assigns or successors, or any legally incorporated railroad company or companies which may be associated with it therein, to build a bridge as hereinafter described.

It seems to me that this authority, especially as it is now amended by the Senator from Kansas and by the last amendment of the Senator from Missouri, will place in the hands of this corporation the entire control of this transit across the Mississippi River for practically seven years. They are to have two years within which to begin the construction and seven years to complete it. Now, it seems to me if there are existing the abuses of which the Senator from Missouri complains, that the authority to build this bridge should be enlarged, so that if this company fail to build it some other company may have an opportunity of coming in within the time and constructing the bridge authorized here. I suggest that to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I do not wish to prolong the discussion if it can be avoided. The gentlemen who propose to build this bridge are the largest property-holders and most prominent citizens of Saint Louis. This is a movement by the Merchants' Exchange, representing the wealth and business of the metropolis of my State, the largest city in the valley of the Mississippi; and it is not to be assumed that these gentlemen would do anything against the interests of commerce—they are all merchants—or that they would go into any sort of juggling arrangement by which the interests of the public at large would be at all jeopardized. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that the twelfth section of this bill expressly prohibits any of the results of which he has spoken here to-day. That section provides:

SEC. 12. That whereas a principal reason for giving authority to build the bridge herein contemplated is to secure reasonable rates and tolls for corporations and individuals for passing over the same, the Saint Louis Merchants' Bridge Company, or its successors or assigns, shall not agree or consent to the consolidation of this bridge with any other bridge across the Mississippi River, or to the pooling of the earnings of this bridge company with the earnings of any other bridge company on said river, nor shall any person who is or may be a stockholder or director or manager of any other bridge over said river be a stockholder or director or manager of the bridge herein provided for.

Under the provisions of this bill the structure must be commenced within two years and finished in seven. The ingenuity of mortal man could not invent an association in whose hands the commerce of the country could be more safely placed than in that of the men who are named in this bill. They are the president of the Merchants' Exchange and the principal merchants of the city; their interests are identified and identical with those of the commerce of Saint Louis and of the country.

I hope the bill will be passed as the amendments have been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Missouri to a word which should be corrected. In section 6, line 6, the first word "well" should read "will;" "or other similar device as will obviate the difficulty."

Mr. VEST. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10091) for the construction of a stable for the use of the horses and wagons for the use of the offices of the House of Representatives was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

JETTIES IN CHARLESTON HARBOR.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator from Florida to allow me to call up a bill reported from the Committee on Commerce making an appropriation for the Charleston Harbor jetties? The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], who objected to it the other day, has withdrawn his objection, and is in favor of the bill. I am sure it will lead to no discussion. If it does I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. CALL. I will consent if it leads to no debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2944) making appropriation for the jetties in Charleston Harbor.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $300,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to expedite the completion of the jetties in Charleston Harbor, said sum to be made available immediately on the passage of this act.

Mr. ALLISON. These appropriations usually come before us in the river and harbor bill. I should be glad to have some explanation of the reason why there is a special appropriation required outside and independent of that bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. This bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and, as I understand, there is a unanimous report from that committee recommending the passage of the bill with the amendment. The bill can go to the other House if passed here, and may there be added to the river and harbor bill or acted on separately, as the House shall deem best.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that if the Senate approve this measure the technical objection that it ordinarily comes before us in a different way will no be pressed. It is a measure upon which depend the commerce and prosperity of the city of Charleston, which, as we all know, has been, within the past few months, overwhelmed by the greatest calamity which can possibly happen to any people. I suppose that there is nothing which tests either individual courage and manhood or the power of endurance and heroic spirit of a community like an earthquake; and certainly there is nothing of which we have more occasion to be proud in American history than the spirit of heroism and gallantry with which that people have met that calamity which so tests every power of human courage and human endurance. And if there were no other reasons I should be glad for one, and I know the people I represent, differing as they do and have done in the past from that community on so many questions of public interest, would be glad to mark our regard for the courage with which that people have met that great trial by making any matter which is for their benefit an exception to the ordinary rules of legislation.

I hope the measure will be passed without any hesitation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I did not make the inquiry in any spirit of opposition to this measure. I only desired to know whether or not this measure had passed through the ordinary processes of legislation in this Chamber. If, as the Senator from South Carolina says, it has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce, I certainly shall interpose no objection to it; and when I made the suggestion, the calamity of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks did not occur to me. I know, as he undoubtedly knows, that this improvement of Charleston Harbor is an improvement that will require many years to complete. It is an improvement more than a mile and a half long, and in some portions of it four miles, from the city of Charleston; and if this appropriation is made now it will only enhance the completion of that improvement if it is to be completed. Any appropriation we make now will of course require less appropriation hereafter, and I believe not only with reference to this work, but with reference to every other one like it, that it would be a wise thing for us to make the entire appropriation when we agree upon the plan of improvement. This method of doling out $100,000 now and $200,000 again, to be expended in the middle of the ocean, is simply a method whereby a set of men are enabled to continue for years an improvement that should be made within two or three years.

Therefore my inquiry was not addressed in any sense with a view to oppose this bill, but rather to understand why it was taken out of the ordinary process of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the policy of Congress has been where some great sudden calamity has come upon a city, like the great fires at Boston and Chicago, in an indirect way, to encourage the people of such places who have suffered the calamity, not by giving them donations, but to throw something in the way of the improvement of the city to stir up the hearts of the people, as by making appropriations to carry on works which the Government had undertaken. For example, $3,000,000 were given to build a custom-house at Chicago and a large amount was voted to go on immediately with the work on a public building in Boston. There are other similar cases that I can think of.

This is a proposition to carry on a work already commenced, to appropriate about the same amount that was appropriated in the last river and harbor bill, but to do it immediately and not make it subject to any contingency whatever as to the amount, or as to the passage of any other bill, so that the people of Charleston may know that the Government would even hasten the completion of that great work in Charleston Harbor by an appropriation even larger than might come in the ordinary distribution of moneys given to improve the rivers and harbors of the country.

It was with that view that I favored making this special appropriation in this case as one of the means of encouraging the people of that city desolated by an earthquake to go on with their rebuilding, to give them heart and courage to remain in their city and rebuild it again. I think the appropriation should be made now, that it should not be subject to any vicissitudes or changes as to amount or as to the possible passage of any other bill.

The Committee on Commerce and Congress undoubtedly, when the river and harbor bill comes up with appropriations for Charleston, will consider the amount advanced in this bill, and do whatever may be right and equitable for this improvement in the regular river and harbor bill.

I hope this bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, and Mr. OWEN the managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 18th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1897) granting a pension to Alexander Trimble;

An act (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide;

An act (S. 1826) granting a pension to Andrew J. Burrell;

An act (S. 362) granting a pension to James H. King;

An act (S. 1660) granting a pension to Samuel E. Tracy;

An act (S. 2372) for the relief of Mary McMahon;

An act (S. 838) granting an increase of pension to General Benjamin F. Kelly; and

An act (S. 1958) granting an increase of pension to Addison A. Jackson.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2149) granting an increase of pension to Herman Baumhager; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 90) appointing James B. Angell a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call up the conference report in the case of the electoral count bill, unless the Senator from Florida proposes something which will take no time. I think this report can be disposed of very briefly.

Mr. CALL. If I have the right to proceed I wish to do so. I hope the Senate will consider the importance of the question. There are sales about to be made of a large amount of land contained in that land grant advertised for sale on the 27th of January, and the result will be to dispossess a large number of people of their homes. I think I can present the case to the Senate, if the resolution shall be taken up, without consuming very much time.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to use whatever authority there is in a conference report to interfere with the convenience of any Senator, certainly not that of my honorable friend from Florida, who is always so courteous; but if his matter is to take some time I should like to call up the conference report, and if it turns out that any Senator desires to debate it, or take any time with it, I shall then consent to its being laid aside informally and to his going on with his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Florida was adopted, and the matter that he desires to speak upon is now pending.

Mr. HOAR. Then let the report of the committee of conference lie, perhaps until to-morrow after the close of the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Florida is before the Senate, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. CALL on the 7th instant:

Resolved, That the grant approved May 17, 1856, granting lands to the State of Florida for the construction of a line of railroad from Fernandina, Fla., to Tampa, Fla., and from the Saint John's River, Florida, to Pensacola, Fla., should be forfeited as to all lands not earned before the time fixed in the act for the expiration of the grant, namely, ten years from the date of the approval of the act in May, 1856; and that the said lands so forfeited shall revert to the United States and be subject to homestead settlement, reserving to all actual settlers the right to 160 acres of land, and the right to enter, at the price of $1.25 per acre, 80 acres of land where they have purchased the same or the improvements on it; and that the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill to the Senate to this effect.

2. Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit through the district attorneys of the United States for an injunction against all corporations, or their agents, attempting to sell, or advertise for sale, the lands of the United States embraced in any grants made to the States or railroad companies while bills for the forfeiture of the same are pending before Congress as to all grants that have been recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to these resolutions and to the facts and arguments which I shall present in regard to them. It is a duty somewhat of a judicial character that the resolutions require the Senate to perform, and it is one of very great importance to many thousands of poor people, and is necessary to their retention of their homes and their earnings, the results of their labors. I therefore ask that the Senate shall give attention to this matter; otherwise I can not hope that there can be any favorable action upon it.

The first resolution asks:

That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit, through the district attorneys of the United States, for an injunction against all corporations or their agents attempting to sell or advertise for sale the lands of the United States embraced in any grants made to States or railroad companies while bills for the forfeiture of the same are pending before Congress, as to all grants that have been recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

This grant is one of the grants recommended to be forfeited by a very large majority of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives. The land in this grant is now advertised and proposed to be sold by the company. I desire to bring before the Senate the facts connected with this grant. I desire the Senate to understand that there has never been a grant of this land made by the State of Florida to the corporation claiming to have it. I desire it to understand that whatever vitality and life there is in this grant, or in the Florida Railway and Navigation corporation as the beneficiary of it, has been given to it in defiance of the laws of the State of Florida or its constituted authorities, and by the unauthorized act of the Interior Department.

To show the importance of this resolution I will present as part of my remarks a letter from a citizen of the United States in the State of Florida. I will not detain the Senate by reading it. It incloses the letter of James E. Tucker, purporting to be a land commissioner of the Florida Navigation and Railway Company, informing him that his land is for sale, his home, the place where for years he has bestowed all his earnings—a little 40-acre tract of land settled in the wilderness, poor, sandy land that has been made valuable by the growth of an orange grove and a lemon grove. He has been informed that he must pay $75 an acre for this land which the Government had given to him as a free gift under the settled policy of the United States, and he writes to me that he is too poor to pay this price; that he has no means to pay it; that he has gone upon this land under the decision of Secretary of the Interior Chandler and his predecessor, and that he has labored until he has made it valuable, and that if he is compelled to pay the $75 an acre his home must be taken away from him and his family be left destitute.

The letter is as follows:

SAN ANTONIO, January 10, 1887.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed you will be pleased to find a true copy of a letter I received from the Florida Navigation and Railway Company. I am at a loss what to do in this matter. I kindly request you to give me an advice. I can not pay that price and neither do I want to give up my property (improvements). My history is as follows: I came here in July, 1882, and found my friend Mr. B. Wichers. I was poor and had a broken health. Mr. Wichers had taken four forties early in November, 1881, before the railroad company had taken, made their selection of land. He, Mr. Wichers, let me have one of the forties, namely: Southwest quarter of the southwest quarter section 1, township 25 south, range 20 east. I settled on it in good faith that I could buy it for $1.25 or $2.50. I worked and lived on it with my family, wife and three children. Now, after five years of hard labor and sweating, the railroad company comes and wants $75 per acre. The land itself is poorer than poor. My improvements are 15 acres cleared, about 300 orange and lemon (Sicily) in grove, a garden which cost me about $300 to drain, a large dwelling and out-houses, and many other improvements. When I came I settled in the wilds, not a new comer but Wichers was in the neighborhood. So we should pay for our own improvements?

An early reply will be highly appreciated by your obedient servant,

WILLIAM SULTENFUSS.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., January 4, 1887.

DEAR SIR: Absence from Jacksonville has prevented an earlier reply to your favor of 18th ultimo. The value placed upon the southwest quarter of southwest quarter section 1, township 25 south, range 20 east, by the men employed by me to grade our lands is $75 per acre, for the 40-acre tract.

We are ready to convey title to the land whenever it may suit your convenience to purchase.

I would suggest that, if it is not convenient for you to purchase the entire tract, you buy from us that portion which you have improved, which I will arrange to place to you at the same rate per acre, or as much of it as you may desire.

The terms of payment, established by my predecessor, W. Corley, are one-fourth cash, and the remaining three-fourths in notes of equal amount, maturing in one, two, and three years, respectively, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum.

If this is not entirely agreeable to you, I will endeavor to arrange terms of payment on a more liberal basis.

Awaiting your response, I remain yours, respectfully,

J. E. TUCKER, Land Commissioner.

WM. SULTENFUSS, esq.,

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Hernando County, ss:

On this 10th day of January, A. D. 1887, before me, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared Wm. Sultenfuss, and being by me duly sworn does depose and say, that the within is a true copy of a letter received by him from J. E. Tucker, land commissioner.

WM. SULTENFUSS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 10th day of January, A. D. 1887.

[SEAL.] JOHN S. FLANAGAN,
Notary Public.

I have another letter from a representative farmer, Mr. P. B. Perry, sr., the contents of which I will state, and will also append it to my remarks:

WHITESVILLE, MARION COUNTY, FLORIDA, January 15, 1887.

OLD FRIEND: I am glad you are all right, and at your post; but sorry that so little can be done this session. "The mills of God grind slowly." But "delays are dangerous," and in this railroad land muddle here it has about ruined the section of country I live in already; many would-be settlers have waited and hoped till they have given away in despair, and are leaving for other parts; deserting their selections and partial improvements in disgust. The friends of the other side are jubilant and confident of success. Everything seems set back, and our common schools are decaying and being suspended. To help all along, "gossip" has it that "hundreds of thousands are being expended up there in favor of the railroads." My country! are there not enough honest men in Congress to control the machine? Surely all the intellect of the land is not for sale! Some are worth more than a dime, eh?

On pensions, Mrs. Logan gets unanimously her two thousand, while the "Mexican veterans" must be put off year after year till their grandchildren will die with old age. Is it any wonder that the socialist, anarchist, &c., are stirring things in our land while all authority, legislative, judicial, and civil, are controlled by money!

Your friend,

P. B. PERRY, Sr.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Perry is a farmer of humble means, representing the great mass of that class of people who have made this country what it is, and without whom it could not longer exist as a republic; a type of the great farming interest of this country. He asks the Senate of the United States whether there is to be found in it any one who will protect the people of the country, who will have consideration for the poor men of the country; and, in a not complimentary way, asks if we are all for sale, so that no justice and no right can be afforded to the people of the country as against a corporation unlawfully claiming the homes of the people as its property.

Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that I propose to show that this railroad corporation never had a grant from the State of Florida. This grant was originally made to the State of Florida. I propose to prove by the record that the State of Florida refused to make a grant of it to this corporation, and yet that they have procured a reservation from the Interior Department of this Government, and have for years withheld these lands from settlement and homestead entry, and without, and in defiance of, the action of the State they have sold, and are selling, the homes of these poor people. If that is not a wrong and an abuse of power that demands action on the part of the Senate, then we may say the people are without friends, and without protection, and without sympathy in this body.

I hope the Senators will listen to me and bear in mind this proposition which I assert now: The Florida Navigation and Railway Company and its predecessors, and all persons in privity with it, never had a grant from the State of Florida, who is the grantee, but, on the contrary, the State of Florida refused to make them the beneficiaries of this grant. Now, let us consider that fact. This is a grant by the United States to the State of Florida for the construction of a line of railroad from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay. That is one part of it. The grant contains within it a provision that—

If any or either of said roads or branch is not completed within ten years no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

I will not stop to discuss the force and effect of that provision. I want now to see whether the State of Florida has ever given to this company or its predecessors the land. I presume it is unnecessary for me to discuss or to insist upon the proposition that if the State of Florida, who is the grantee, has never given this land or pledged these lands to this company, they can have no right to them.

This is the year 1887. This act making the grant was approved on the 17th day of May, 1856. In all that time, bear in mind, I assert and will prove the fact that the State of Florida has never given to this railroad company, or any predecessor of it, or any person in privity with it, the lands granted by this act, or any part of them, for the construction of that road.

Now, the first reference that I will make is to a very able and patriotic and useful decision and opinion of Hon. Zachariah Chandler, then Secretary of the Interior and afterward a Senator here of distinction and of very high reputation in the country. On the 29th of April, 1876, in reference to this railroad company and to this line of railroad from Waldo to Tampa Bay, Florida, he said:

While I do not question the principle established by the Supreme Court in the case of Schulenberg vs. Harriman, cited by you, that the title which vested in the State of Florida by the grant and definite location of the road could not be divested by the mere failure to complete the road so located within the time fixed by the act, I find nothing in that case to sustain the doctrine that the State retains the right for an indefinite period, and long after the date fixed for the completion of the road, to designate its route and thus give effect to the grant.

The important act of definitely locating the road can only be performed by or under the authority of the State, and it should be done within a reasonable time after the date of the grant, and in all cases before the expiration of the time fixed for completing the road. Failure to discharge this duty should be taken as conclusive evidence of abandonment of the grant.

The completion and operation of the road from Fernandina to Cedar Key as a single line, coupled with the failure for fifteen years thereafter to designate the line or perform any other act indicating an intention to build the road to Tampa Bay, would naturally be accepted as such an abandonment of the latter portion of the line as would render a former forfeiture unnecessary.

Under all the circumstances, I do not conceive it to be my duty to aid in reviving a grant which has so long remained dormant.

Up to that period of time there had been no location of this grant; the Legislature had not claimed the grant; the State had not authorized the location of the grant. What then? We find an opinion of Mr. Schurz, five years after the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, opening these lands to settlement and occupation, from 1876 to 1881, fifteen years from the original grant's expiration, in which Mr. Schurz reversed this decision of Secretary Chandler, and here is his opinion. Let us see upon what ground in 1881, fifteen years after the expiration of this grant, Mr. Schurz reversed the decision, reserved the lands from entry, and under that reservation, without any other authority, these parties are selling the homes, and the labor, and the possessions of these people in Florida. Let us see upon what ground Mr. Schurz took that action, for it is important in the history of this case. On the 28th of January, 1881, Mr. Schurz said:

SIR: On the 10th of November, 1879, you submitted the application of the Atlantic, Gulf, and West India Transit Company, formerly the Florida Railroad Company, for a—review of my predecessor's decision of April 29, 1876, rejecting the claim for a withdrawal of lands and the recognition of the rights of said company, under act of May 17, 1856, (11 Stats., 15,) upon a line of route exhibited by a map filed in your office by the engineer of the company December 14, 1860; which map, being returned to him January 22, 1861, for the procurement of the governor's certificate, was lost or mislaid, and an alleged duplicate of the same was presented for filing by the president of the company December 7, 1875, and transmitted by your office April 20, 1876.

It is well to bear these names in mind—

The grant was in aid of the construction of a railroad in the State of Florida, from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay, with a branch to Cedar Key, and the map in question was intended to show that portion of the line from the junction of the Cedar Key branch at Waldo to the waters of Tampa Bay, all other portions of the route having been previously exhibited by maps filed in and recognized by the Department.

The reason given for declining to recognize the map was because it was not shown to have been filed under and by the authority of the State; and it was held that as the time limited by Congress for the completion of the road had long since expired, without any attempt by the State authorities to fix the time so as to give precision to the time conveyed, such failure should be taken as conclusive evidence of such complete abandonment of the grant as would render a formal declaration of forfeiture unnecessary.

The application for review is made upon the ground that material facts which go to show the authority of the company to locate the line and file the map were not before my predecessor, and which, had the same been presented and considered, would, in the judgment of the applicant, have contributed to a different conclusion, much of the matter being newly discovered and not within the reach of the company at the date of the original application.

It will be borne in mind by Senators who wish to protect the people, who have any sympathy with the poor men of this country, that this declaration of Mr. Schurz is—

The reason given for declining to recognize the map was because it was not shown to have been filed under and by the authority of the State; and material facts discovered which would show the authority of the company to locate the line and file the map.

There were then to be material facts authorizing the company to locate the line and file a map. Where were those material facts?

I wish to show the people of this country how the rights of the poor men, women, and children are trifled with, and upon what absurd and unreasonable pretenses their homes are taken from them. What were the facts upon which this claim of newly-discovered evidence as to the authority of this company to locate this line? Let me read:

Such being the condition of the cause, I have examined the various documents presented, and am of the opinion that sufficient ground for review is established, and the right of the company may be further considered by the Department.

No fact stated.

Respecting the competency of the company to make the surveys and file the maps of definite location as representative or assignee of the State under her laws, I find that in the case of all the roads provided for by act of May 17, 1856, the accepted practice of the Department was, and has been, to recognize such location when presented upon maps filed by the companies, and that certifications of lands granted were made in favor of all the various grants recognized by State legislation, including the Florida Railroad Company, as to all that portion of the road so located.

The return of the map for the governor's certificate in 1860 appears to have been an act of due caution on the part of your office to place beyond question the fact of State authorization, but I do not understand that the approval of the governor was the only means by which such authority might be established, or that it was essential to the validity of the survey, fixing the line upon the face of the ground, of which the plat filed was intended to be made the proper notification and evidence for the Department.

Without inquiry into the laws of the State, assuming the fact to be so, he declares that under the legislation of the State of Florida this company, as assignee of the State, had a right. There is no such legislation of the State. On the contrary, as I shall prove, the records of the State show that they refused to this company the right to become the beneficiary of this grant; and here is the Interior Department, through two several incumbents of distinction and character, passing away a million acres and more of the public lands of the country, and the homes of the people, in defiance of its established public policy and the letter and spirit of the law, upon an assertion which is utterly untrue. There is no such legislation, and I shall demonstrate it presently.

He goes on to say that the president of the road—and I will put this in my remarks, but I can state it briefly—proved that a map had been filed in the General Land Office, and that it was rejected in 1860 upon the ground that it was not authenticated by the governor.

The exact correspondence with the map of 1860 of the duplicate plat now filed appears to have been sufficiently shown, and there remains no doubt that the line exhibited was surveyed and marked as the definite location of the road; that it was recognized as such by the officers of the company and the State authorities; and that the map was filed in the same manner as the surveys of previous portions of the line had been filed in the office of the secretary of state of Florida.

This being the condition of the case, and the map being now before me officially approved by M. L. Stearns, governor of the State at the date of its presentation, the only question relating to its acceptance that can, in my judgment, be considered is, whether or not the lands can be legally certified to the State in view of the limitation of the time contained in the provision of the granting act, that if the road "is not completed within ten years no further sales shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States."

Upon this point the authorities are clear and express to the effect that the proviso in question is a condition subsequent of which no one but the grantor can take advantage; and until some proceeding in the nature of "office found" be instituted the grantee may enjoy the estate upon the original fee, and no reversion can take place by mere operation of law. (Schulenberg vs. Harriman, 21 Wallace, 44; Opinions of Attorney-General, November 29, 1879, case of Southern Minnesota Railway Company, and of October 26, 1880, case of Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company.)

The map and accompanying papers are accordingly transmitted for your files, and you are directed to make the necessary withdrawal of lands to protect the rights of the company and secure the proper adjustment of the grant upon the line designated.

Your attention is also particularly invited to the formal waiver of the company in favor of actual settlers prior to December 13, 1875, and you are instructed to make respectful request for a like waiver covering the time since that date, and up to the time when formal notice of the withdrawal can be communicated to the district land office.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

These are the new facts, the material facts, showing the authority of the company to locate the land and claim the grant. Their importance and their materiality, and their being new and lately discovered facts, it will be seen exist only in the assertion of the Secretary. They are not facts, and they are not material, and do not in any way establish any right in this company.

If I shall demonstrate that, I think the Senate will give the relief these people desire. You will bear in mind that Mr. Schurz and his successors have insisted upon this reservation of this land from entry and settlement, from occupation and purchase at the Government price, upon the ground, first, that the Florida Railway and Navigation Company is the beneficiary under the State laws of the act of Congress of 1856; secondly, that they located their line under authority of the State, filed a map of location as an evidence of it, but that it was sent back for the governor's certificate, being a mere technical formality which, the grant to the railway company, having been made by the State and certified by the State authorities, could be dispensed with. I propose to show that there was no map necessary, and that it was not a pertinent question. I propose to show that the governor of the State refused to approve the location and denied the authority of the railroad company, and that the Legislature upon a solemn inquisition into the facts denied the right of this company to this grant, and created another corporate body, limiting its rights, and that it failed also and has never claimed to have the right to the lands of this grant.

This grant was made in 1856. I read from the journal of the house of representatives of the State of Florida in 1858, a public document published by the authority of the State and evidence of the facts contained within it. The governor of the State, Madison F. Perry, inaugurated in 1856 and holding office until 1860, covering the whole period of time antecedent to the war of the chartered life of this corporation and the years in which this legislation was had, thus addressed the Legislature; and we may see therefore that this question whether this company was the beneficiary of this grant, whether it had any right in the matter, is not a new question, but was considered by the governor and the Legislature of the State and decided at the very beginning of the life of this grant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). The Chair informs the Senator from Florida that the hour of 2 having arrived he will place before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the bill be passed over informally and that the Senator from Florida be allowed to complete his remarks.

Mr. PLUMB. Before that order is entered I should like to say that inasmuch as this resolution proposes to instruct the committee of which I am a member, and for the time-being chairman, I shall ask the consent of the Senate, immediately on the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Florida, to say something from the committee standpoint in regard to this subject, and I do not want any limitation imposed which would cut me off.

Mr. GEORGE. So far as I am concerned I will agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the Senator from Florida will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. CALL. I shall be very glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands address the Senate. If I can not satisfy him that this resolution ought to pass, that there never has been any grant, and no pretense of a grant, from the State, that the State has refused to authorize this company to be a beneficiary of the grant, then I shall be disappointed. I think there will be no Senator who will give his attention that will entertain a doubt on the subject.

I have said that it was important for us to know that the governor of the State and the Legislature in 1858 considered the question whether the Florida Railroad, of which the Atlantic, Gulf and West India Company, in whose favor this reservation has been made, had any rights under this grant of 1856. The governor says:

It is considered by some that the only duty imposed upon the trustees is to certify the interest upon the bonds of the several companies as presented and when presented, upon the filing of the certificate and affidavits required by the provisions of the act; that they are not authorized or empowered to inquire whether or not the proposed location of any road is a good one, in reference to the wants of the people and the safety of the trust fund (which forms the basis of the whole superstructure), or if the roads are being constructed in accordance with the specifications of the act, and have "sufficient outlet to the ocean for sea steamers at their termini," as required by some of their charters; or, in any wise to supervise the action of the companies which have accepted the provisions of the act.

If this is the proper interpretation of the law, if the State has set apart ten or twelve million acres of land to aid in the construction of certain lines of road upon conditions which are rapidly absorbing and will probably absorb the whole fund, and the trustees are powerless, save to execute the bonds when presented and as presented, the sooner the error is corrected the better, or otherwise abolish the board of trustees, and at least save the $1,700 which are annually being paid to some of its members in the shape of salaries. I entertain very different views of the powers and duties of the trustees, and will act upon them in the absence of further legislation upon the subject.

Nearly 10,000,000 of acres have been patented to the State under the act of 1850, and it is estimated that several millions will yet accrue to the State in South or Peninsula Florida. As soon as that portion of the State is surveyed, the other selections will be made and reported. Companies have been organized, and have accepted the provisions of the act, on the various lines of road indicated in the fourth section, and all are in course of construction except that portion of the line from Tallahassee to Pensacola, the greater portion of which is under contract conditionally, and that portion of the line from Amelia Island, on the Atlantic, to Tampa Bay, in South Florida, with an extension to Cedar Key, in East Florida, as lies between the point of divergence with the extension and Tampa Bay.

A company has been organized to construct that portion of the line which lies between the point of divergence with the extension known as the Bellamy Station, or Waldo and Tampa Bay, the Florida Railroad Company having failed to accept that portion of the line within the time prescribed by the act, and an application will be made to the present General Assembly for a charter to build a road on said line.

Now let us see. In that session of the Legislature to which this message was addressed will be found upon the journal the following report:

Mr. Ingram, from the committee on corporations, made the following report—

I read from the journal of the Legislature of the State of Florida in 1858, on the 13th of December, an official document—

The committee on corporations, to whom was recommitted a bill to be entitled an act to incorporate a company to construct a railroad from a point on the Florida Railroad in East Florida to Tampa Bay, under the style of the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company—

The report of the Interior Department, of Mr. Schurz and all his predecessors, shows that no claim has ever been allowed to the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company of a right to this grant under this reservation, and that no reservation has been made in its favor.

The report of the committee on corporations of the Legislature proceeds—for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the attorney-general in reference to the constitutionality of said bill, beg leave to report, that they have referred said bill to the attorney-general and have obtained his opinion in reference to the constitutionality thereof, which opinion is herewith reported to the house, together with said bill.

The attorney-general says in his communication to the Legislature:

You communicate to me a resolution of the house of representatives by which the committee on corporations are instructed to obtain the opinion in writing of the attorney-general, whether the "bill to be entitled an act to construct a railroad from a point on the Florida Railroad, in East Florida, to Tampa Bay, under the style of the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company," in any of its provisions does or does not conflict with the chartered rights or privileges of any other company.

Irrespective of the internal-improvement act, I have been able to discover no conflict between the rights proposed to be granted by the bill in question, and those already granted to any corporation heretofore chartered. Is there any conflict by virtue of any of the provisions of the internal-improvement law?

You will understand that this Florida Railroad Company and this Atlantic, Gulf and West India Railroad Company claimed this grant under the provisions of the internal improvement law of the State of Florida. Bear that in mind. The attorney-general, the Legislature having under consideration a bill and having passed that bill and having had it recommitted, a bill giving the benefit of the lands contained in this grant to the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company on the line from Waldo to Tampa, is inquired of whether that act will conflict with the rights of the Florida Railroad Company, whether the Florida Railroad Company had any rights under the laws of the State to this grant. These very questions were presented to him, and let us see what was the opinion of the attorney-general and what was the action of the Legislature, whether it was then claimed by any authority that such a right existed in the Florida Railroad Company or ever by any one until this grant was made by the Interior Department assuming that such legislative authority existed.

The attorney-general says:

The fourth section of the internal-improvement act, in prescribing the improvements to be aided from the internal-improvement fund, declares "a line from Amelia Island on the Atlantic to the waters of Tampa Bay in South Florida, with an extension to Cedar Keys in East Florida," as among them.

The fifth section declares, "That the several railroads now organized or chartered by the Legislature, or that may hereafter be chartered, any portion of whose routes, as authorized by their different charters and amendments thereto, shall be within the line of routes laid down in section 4, shall have the right and privilege of constructing that part of the line embraced by their charter, on giving notice to the trustees of the internal-improvement fund of their full acceptance of the provisions of this act, specifying the part of the road they propose to construct; and upon the refusal or neglect of any railroad company now organized to accept, within six months from the passage of this act, the provisions of the same, any other company, duly authorized by law, may undertake the construction of such part of the line as they may desire to make, and which may not be in progress of construction under a previous charter."

That is a quotation from the internal-improvement act, made in the opinion of the attorney-general. I will not delay the Senate to read from this opinion, but I will come to the point. He is now inquiring whether the Florida Railroad Company, which the opinion of Mr. Schurz, the opinion of Mr. Teller, the opinion of the present Secretary, without investigation, without knowledge of the facts, assumed to exist—he is inquiring whether the Florida Railroad Company, as supposed by the Interior Department, have any interest, under the internal-improvement law and that section of the law, in the route and in the benefits provided by that act from Waldo to Tampa, in Florida.

It will be remembered that the Florida Railroad, which is the predecessor and the same corporation as the Atlantic, Gulf and West India Company, was organized under a charter antecedent to the internal-improvement law, that it accepted the benefits of the internal-improvement law to a certain extent, that is, from Amelia Island to Cedar Key, that it was under the internal-improvement law that these lands were given and to be disposed of. It will be borne in mind that under its charter and without any aid from the internal-improvement law or from the internal-improvement fund, or from this grant, it had a right to build a road to Tampa Bay. As to that there are two questions, first, as to the charter right to go to Tampa, and the question we are considering as to the right under the internal-improvement law, which alone disposes of this grant and of the other lands of the State, to aid and benefit from the provisions of that act.

We are to be judges, and this our function as Senators requires us to be. We have no right to be here unless we can judge and decide fairly and act promptly when the homes of the people depend upon that judgment and the question is presented here for our calm, sensible, intelligent judgment, not as lawyers, but as just and reasonable men. I say there is no pretense of any law, of any decision, of any public authoritative action of the Legislature or any official of the State of Florida that this railroad company ever was the beneficiary of this grant. The attorney-general in 1858 says so, and we will see what the Legislature then did. The attorney-general in his opinion, continuing, says:

> What, among other things, is required by the internal-improvement act to prevent another road from being built laterally? The most prominent requirement is the filing a plat of the route in the office of the secretary of state. No plat of the route from the diverging point to Cedar Key to the waters of Tampa Bay has been filed, as required, in the office of the secretary of state. While, therefore, the Florida Railroad Company may be entitled to build their road to the waters of Tampa Bay under authority of the amended charter, they are not, in my opinion, entitled to the benefit of the restriction against the building of a lateral road, and hence I conclude there is no provision of the bill referred to your committee which conflicts with the chartered rights of any other company.
> It may not be considered amiss for me to add, in view of what has been said in reference to the fifth section, that, in my opinion, any other company proposing or undertaking the construction of the line from Tampa to the point of divergence to Cedar Key on the Florida Railroad, under the internal-improvement law, would not be entitled to the benefits of the law on such part of the line as may be "in progress of construction under a previous charter."
> The authority of the Florida Railroad Company to build the road from the point of divergence to the waters of Tampa is claimed to be derived from the act to amend the act incorporating the said company, approved 14th December, 1855. There is nothing in this act that I can discover which conflicts with the bill referred to your committee, unless it is determined that all exclusive rights and benefits of the internal-improvement act are, by the terms of the said first section, unconditionally conferred on said company. I am, however, inclined to the opinion that the real intent of the first section of the amended act was simply to grant to the Florida Railroad Company the privilege of building their road to the waters of Tampa Bay, and that if they desired the exclusive privileges offered in the internal-improvement law, they must conform to the conditions and adopt the course which only secures them to other companies, because to come under the internal-improvement law is to come under its conditions as well as its benefits.

Here is the governor of the State asserting that it is a question of very grave doubt whether this company is entitled to the benefits of that act for any part of its line even to Cedar Key, and asserting to the Legislature that it has failed to comply with the provisions of the internal-improvement law as to the road from Waldo to Tampa, and that it has not acquired any rights under that law to the benefits of the act for that part of the line. Here is a bill introduced in the Legislature of Florida giving the benefit of this grant to another railroad company.

Here is the opinion of the attorney-general of the State that the Florida Railroad Company, and consequently the Atlantic, Gulf and West India Trust Company, which is a mere change of name by the Legislature, for which this land has been reserved by the Interior Department, were not entitled to it under the internal-improvement law, which is the only legislative act, the only act of the Legislature of Florida disposing or attempting to dispose of the land contained in the grant of 1856. Here is the governor of the State addressing the Legislature in specific terms, asserting, as I have read from his message in 1858, that the Florida Railroad Company, or the Atlantic, Gulf and West India Railroad Company had failed to acquire any rights under this sole legislative disposition of the land contained in the grant of 1856. I desire to call attention to that fact.

The opinion of the attorney-general was read and placed among the orders of the day. And the bill subsequently became a law. I should not weary the Senate with this discussion, but the Constitution has confided this question to Senators, and they have sworn to perform that duty upon their honor as men. The people of Florida, the poor people, the men, women, and children, emigrants from your own States, many of them, are being turned out of house and home and the proceeds of years of labor. I have read you their letters. Of one of them $75 an acre is demanded for his little 40-acre tract. Now I am showing you that the corporation making this demand has not even the pretense of a right; that there never was a legislative act of the State of Florida granting it the benefits of the act of 1856; that it was denied to the Florida Railroad Company; that the governor of the State in 1856 so declared, that the attorney-general so declared, and I am now going to read you the act of the Legislature of Florida which they passed giving these rights to another railroad company with which they have no privity and which itself did not perform the obligations of the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Florida kindly consent to postpone his further remarks until to-morrow, that I may move an executive session?

Mr. CALL. I will if it be desired, but in the meantime I wish to say that these people's homes are advertised to be sold on the 27th of January by this corporation, and I ask the Senate in behalf of these thousands of people, men, women, and children, who are being dispossessed of their property by the action of the Interior Department upon facts which do not exist and upon constructions of law which have no foundation whatever, to consider this matter. If it be to the convenience of the Senate or to the interest of public business to postpone it until to-morrow, I shall not be in the way of that, but I beg that Senators will perform their duty, inasmuch as the homes of these people depend upon it, and examine this case and consider it and act upon it not later than to-morrow.

HIATT AND COMPANY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending this motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President, which will be read.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 7th ultimo, from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill "for the relief of Hiatt & Co., late traders for the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes."

The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1887.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message and the accompanying papers, if there be no objection, will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know the nature of that communication exactly, but it is possible that it is of such a nature that it ought to be referred to the committee to investigate the matter of the appointment of Indian traders. I am not sure. Let it lie on the table for the present until I can examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CHACE. I wish to offer an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 20, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 19, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SKILLIGALLEE LIGHT-STATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board, recommending an appropriation to rebuild the Skilligallee light-house tower, Lake Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LAKE PROVIDENCE REACH, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid defore the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence relative to the restriction in the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886, of the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi River at the Lake Providence Reach and Pilcher's Point; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

BERNABI M. MONTAÑO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico upon the private land claim known as the Bernabi M. Montaño et al. grant No. 49; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JOHN R. M'KENZIE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of John R. McKenzie, administrator, against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SIMON WELKOWSKIE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of Simon Welkowskie against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

A bill (S. 2997) granting a pension to Mrs. M. E. Woods;
A bill (S. 2884) granting a pension to Mrs. Anna Etheridge Hooks;
A bill (S. 2687) granting a pension to William B. Barnes;
A bill (S. 2532) for the relief of Mary H. Casler;
A bill (S. 2293) granting a pension to Hannah C. DeWitt;
A bill (S. 2486) granting a pension to John Spruce;
A bill (S. 2252) granting a pension to Susan A. Duncan;

ELIZABETH RICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 2216) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth Rice; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BUILDING, WILMINGTON, N. C.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 229), with a House amendment disagreed to by the Senate, and directed the reading of the message from the Senate, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 18, 1887.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate 229, to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHONE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. RANSOM be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the request of the Senate for a conference will be agreed to, and the Chair will appoint the conferees on the part of the House during the day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of F. H. Ladd.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to correct an erroneous reference. The bill (H. R. 5959) granting a right of way through certain public lands of the United States in the Territory of Utah, &c., did not show by its title that the right of way referred to extended through a military reservation. An examination of the bill shows such to be the fact; and if there be no objection the Committee on Public Lands will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ROBERT STRACHAN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 574) for the relief of Robert Strachan, and that the bill be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That jurisdiction be, and the same is hereby, conferred upon the United States Court of Claims to hear, try, and determine, according to the rules and practice now in force in said court, any claim for damage which Robert Strachan may have against the District of Columbia by reason of the said District of Columbia, or its agents, servants, or employés, having changed the grade of New Hampshire avenue between Sixteenth and Seventeenth streets, and having turned the water upon the premises of the said Strachan and into his dwelling-house, and by means of an embankment having been erected and continued thereon for a long time, in said District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the judgment rendered in said action, if any shall be rendered for the claimant, shall be paid in the same manner as judgments are paid in said court as now provided by law; and one-half of the amount of said judgment shall be charged against the revenues of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the Government hereby waives all rights under the statute of limitations as to his claim.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims were read, as follows:

In lines 9 and 10 of section 1, strike out the words "having changed the grade of New Hampshire avenue, between Sixteenth and Seventeenth streets, and."
In line 12 of the same section, strike out the word "and."
In line 13 of the same section, strike out the words "by them."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of Robert Strachan and others was pending before the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress. A report was made by the Committee on the District of Columbia, a copy of which may be found in the appendix to this report, recommending the passage of said bill, for the relief of Robert Strachan only, but the bill was not reached by the Senate, and in view of the fact that it could not be so reached, it was sent to the Court of Claims, under the first clause of section 1059 of the Revised Statutes. This clause gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction over "all claims which may be referred to it by either House of Congress." The Court of Claims, however, upon the motion of the Attorney-General to dismiss, held that they could not take jurisdiction of the claim for the reason that, in the opinion of the court, that clause does not give to the separate Houses of Congress the power to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims against the District of Columbia, but only upon claims against the United States.

In the present Congress bills for the relief of Robert Strachan were presented in both Houses, giving the Court of Claims jurisdiction, and waiving any right under the statute of limitations. The Senate bill has passed that body, and is now before this committee.

Your committee therefore recommend that the House bill lie upon the table, and they report back the Senate bill with a recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendments: At the beginning of line 8, section 1, strike out the word "and" and insert the words "or by reason of their;" in line 9 strike out the word "and" between the words "dwelling-house" and "by," and in line 10 insert the words "by them" between the words "continued" and "thereon."

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GALLINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS NEAR CHICAGO FOR MILITARY PURPOSES.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that joint resolution (S. 78) authorizing the Secretary of War to accept certain lands, and so forth, near Chicago, Ill., be taken from the House Calendar for immediate consideration.

The joint resolution, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would like to look into it a little further before it passes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir.

MISSION INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 53) for the relief of the Mission Indians in the State of California, and that the bill be now considered.

The bill, with the amendments reported by the Commiteee on Indian Affairs, was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HATCH. This is too important a bill to be considered in this way. I demand the regular order.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, and Mr. OWEN as conferees on the part of the House upon the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of standing and select committees for reports.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees.

Mr. BRAGG. Yesterday I was absent when the committees were called. Therefore I object.

THOMAS C. SIMPSON.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 10373) to authorize the reissue of certain United States currency to Thomas C. Simpson, of Arkansas; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 7062) to correct the muster of Second Lieut. Edwin E. Lewis; and

A bill (H. R. 8229) removing the charge of desertion from the military record of Charles K. Jenree.

RULES AND ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with amendments the bill (S. 1490) to amend Article CIII of the Rules and Articles of War; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HOSPITAL STEWARDS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with amendment the bill (S. 1119) to provide for the appointment of hospital stewards in the United States Army, and to fix their pay and allowance; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD THROUGH FORT MEADE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10048) to authorize the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley Railroad to build its road across the Fort Meade Military Reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is this a private bill?

Mr BRAGG. In this case we are legislating for a corporation as a public corporation, and I presume the bill should be regarded as a public bill.

The SPEAKER (after examining the bill). In the opinion of the Chair this is a private bill, as it simply authorizes a private corporation to extend its road through a military reservation.

Mr. BRAGG. If corporations of this kind are private corporations, the Chair will permit me to inquire what right we have to be legislating upon them as public corporations in the interstate-commerce bill?

The SPEAKER. This is a private corporation; but Congress has the right to legislate in this matter because the bill proposes to grant the right of way through a military reservation of the United States.

Mr. BRAGG. But in other bills we legislate with reference to these railroad corporations as public corporations.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANKLIN W. M'CAULEY.

Mr. FINDLAY, from the Committe on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6535) to close the account of Franklin W. McCauley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT W. SPANG.

Mr. FINDLAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9446) for the relief of Robert W. Spang; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying reports printed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 7366) to remove the charge of desertion against Rufus Wright;

A bill (H. R. 4260) for the relief of Henry Linebaugh, late of Company A, Third Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 2584) for the relief of Benwood Hunter;

A bill (H. R. 6268) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Amos Shirey;

A bill (H. R. 6189) for the relief of John Butler;

A bill (H. R. 5429) for the relief of R. W. Ross;

A bill (H. R. 5829) for the relief of Henry C. Wiley;

A bill (H. R. 5709) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of R. P. Sunnard;

A bill (H. R. 6417) for the relief of Dr. Charles A. Bucher;

A bill (H. R. 6262) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of August Grosse;

A bill (H. R. 5140) granting relief to William C. McCroskey, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 6740) to remove the charge of desertion from Hezekiah E. Vibbart;

A bill (H. R. 6289) to correct the muster-roll of William Carter;

A bill (H. R. 4636) for the relief of John Reed;

A bill (H. R. 4214) for the relief of Albert C. Pontius; and

A bill (H. R. 3935) for the relief of John J. Miller.

RUSSELL S. NEWELL.

Mr. STORM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 6724) for the relief of Russell S. Newell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. REBECCA ADAMS.

Mr. STORM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 751) for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca Adams; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, YONKERS, N. Y.

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1597) for the erection of a public building at Yonkers, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEBRASKA CITY, NEBR.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1880) for the completion of the public building at Nebraska City, Nebr.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Patents, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trademarks, and copyrights; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. SWOPE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3471) for the relief of Charles K. Remsberg, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. 9018) granting a pension to William High; which was ordered to be laid upon the table, and the accompanying report printed.

BESSIE S. GILMORE.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1189) for the relief of Bessie L. Gilmore; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8586) to amend section 685 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHITTENDEN BROTHERS.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 938) for the relief of Chittenden Brothers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORTRAIT OF GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on the Library, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. 1949) providing for the purchase of the portrait of General George H. Thomas, painted by General S. W. Price; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. S. BISHOP.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. 2028) granting a pension to E. S. Bishop; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EULOGIES ON DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent that the order setting apart to-morrow evening for the consideration of resolutions in relation to the death of Mr. ARNOT, Mr. BEACH, and Mr. DOWDNEY, late Representatives from New York, be vacated, and that the same order be made for two weeks from to-morrow evening. I ask this at the request of Mr. Hewitt, of New York.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FIRING ON PERSONS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Whereas it is charged that on the 13th day of January, 1887, a squad of soldiers, said to belong to Company L, Fifth United States Cavalry, fired upon certain persons, residents of Sumner County, Kansas, who were temporarily in the Indian Territory, but not to exceed 10 miles from their homes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the House whether such troops did on or about the date aforesaid fire upon any person or persons in said Territory; and, if so, report the facts connected therewith, and whether said troops acted under orders.

CONSIDERATION OF EDUCATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the hour for the consideration of bills, which begins at 4 minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Labor.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday refused to lay on the table the resolution reported by the Committee on Labor and amendment thereto fixing a day for the consideration of the education bill.

Mr. WILLIS. To save time, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 78, not voting 77; as follows:

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HISCOCK.

For this day:

Mr. HALE with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. JAMES.

On this vote:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. NEGLEY.

On the education bill:

Mr. BARRY with Mr. THROCKMORTON.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, pending the demand of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. WILLIS. And upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 20, not voting 75; as follows:

Pending the yea-and-nay vote the following proceedings occurred:

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DINGLEY. As I understand the question the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] moved the previous question on the resolution and amendment. Pending that motion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moved, under the rule, to commit. What I wish to ask is whether a second motion is admissible with the previous question pending.

The SPEAKER. The question now to be voted upon is whether the previous question shall be ordered on the motion to commit.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Several members objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, on the pending question.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. BINGHAM on the pending question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], to commit the resolution and the amendment to the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken, and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays in order to economize time.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 39, noes 44.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted. I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not required to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and there were—ayes 44, noes 18.

Mr. MILLS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that on any question pertaining to the call of the yeas and nays a quorum is not necessary, as the yeas and nays is a means often resorted to for securing the attendance of a quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand tellers upon the motion to reconsider.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. WILLIS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—28 in the affirmative, but before the count was completed the Speaker announced that the hour for the consideration of bills had expired.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I call up the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to ask the Speaker's attention to the special order on page 74 of the Calendar, and, under that special order (if the Speaker deems it in order), to ask the immediate consideration of the resolution which has just been pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] calls up for consideration a privileged matter, which of course must first be disposed of. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] can raise the question of consideration against it if he desires.

Mr. DANIEL. I raise the question of consideration in favor of a question of prior privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of prior privilege to a conference report.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, if this has priority——

The SPEAKER. But it has not.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is voted down, will it not then be in order for the gentleman from Virginia to call up from the Committee on Labor, under the special order, the resolution to which he refers?

The SPEAKER. It will be, unless he is then interrupted by some order which has priority over that.

Mr. HATCH. I propose to call up a prior order.

The SPEAKER. In order to avoid misapprehension, the Chair will cause the Clerk to read the resolution to which the gentleman from Kentucky has referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 3d day of June, 1886, after the hour for the consideration of bills, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by the Committee on Labor; this order not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills; bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, or prior orders; and, whether so interfered with on that day or not, shall be a continuing order as above until the bills presented by said committee shall be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It will be observed that under this resolution business of the Committee on Labor is not to interfere with general appropriation bills, revenue bills, bills reported by the Committee on Public Lands, or prior orders. Now if none of the business of these classes is called up previous to the vote upon the gentleman's motion, his motion is in order. Moreover, the Chair will state it is in order for the gentleman to make his motion at any time; but if any gentleman interested in a prior order calls up such business, the vote must first be taken on the consideration of that prior order. This is in accordance with all the rulings.

Mr. WILLIS. And if a majority of the House votes down prior special orders, this resolution will be reached?

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to consider, when called up, any of the business which has priority, then that proposition would be voted upon.

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, when this prior order was granted to the Labor Committee was it not understood, and was it not stated to the House, that the "Blair bill" would not be called up under it?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order. The RECORD will show what was said.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A reference to the RECORD will show that statement.

Mr. DUNN. The RECORD does not show any such statement.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then the RECORD does not show the truth.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not the question raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] a privileged one?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] raises the question of consideration, as he has the right to do. The question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the report of the conference committee on the interstate-commerce bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 104, noes 73.

So the House decided to consider the report of the committee of conference on the bill in relation to interstate commerce.

Mr. CRISP. Before we proceed to the further consideration of this conference report, I should like to obtain, if possible, some understanding as to when a vote can be had on this proposition. While, of course, I do not wish to be understood as desiring a vote before reasonable opportunity has been given to members to express their views, I do feel the necessity of early action on this subject, so that other business which is pressing may be considered by the House. If there could be any intimation or agreement as to when the vote could be taken, it would greatly convenience members and relieve me of the necessity of calling the previous question on my own responsibility.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia might perhaps postpone until later in the day the effort to reach an agreement in regard to taking the vote. At that time we may be able to see how many gentleman desire to speak. We are now just resuming the debate at 2 o'clock. At 5 o'clock this afternoon there will be perhaps some indication as to the members who may still desire to speak, and when the debate may be closed without shutting any one off.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have no objection to the early conclusion of the debate on this question; but I should be opposed to any arrangement by which those of us who desire to talk against this bill would be deprived of the privilege of doing so. It is well understood that the rule is to recognize, first, members of the committee; and if we make any agreement now, they may consume all the time, depriving all other members of the House of the right to say one word on a bill which has never heretofore been before the House and a bill which can not now be amended, which must be either rejected or adopted as a whole. I ask that members who are opposed to this bill and want to vote against it may have an opportunity to express themselves. There are members here who will speak against the bill but will vote for it; and they have no right to be recognized as opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Georgia to make any motion at this time.

Mr. CRISP. My purpose was to arrive, if possible, at an understanding.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman it would be wisest under all the circumstances if he should let the debate go on for the present.

Mr. CRISP. In the absence, then, of any agreement, I give notice now that if the House will sustain me I shall ask a vote upon this bill as soon to-morrow morning as I can be recognized after the second morning hour.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. But not before to-morrow morning?

Mr. CRISP. Not before that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this bill has been under discussion in both branches of Congress for several years it does not seem to me it is necessary now to take up any great amount of time with its further consideration. As one of the minority of the House Committee on Commerce I desire to congratulate the House and the country that we have at last relieved ourselves from what has always seemed to me the unwise and unjust provisions of the so-called Reagan bill. Through a committee of conference of the two Houses we have succeeded in eliminating many of the unreasonable and objectionable featuers of that bill, and having presented to us a measure which somewhere near meets the public desire, and without crippling, or seriously crippling, the great railroad interests of the country.

Representing great commercial, financial, and agricultural sections—northern constituencies interested in building up rather than pulling down, believers in the doctrine that railroads and the people can work together for the mutual good, and that they are willing so to do—the minority of the House Committee on Commerce, although denied representation on the conference committee, are now convinced that our arguments against injustice did not fall wholly upon stony ground.

The conference report has been before the country for several weeks and meets with quite general approval, except the two clauses that refer to the "long and short haul" and the question of "pooling."

To these two matters I intend to confine my remarks. Upon these two points "hang all the law and the prophets," perhaps more properly called "loss or profits."

Aside from these two matters I do not propose to discuss the bill at any length. The fourth section, referring to the long and short haul, has never been satisfactorily explained.

Lawyers and statesmen are badly at sea as to its interpretation. A clause susceptible of so many different constructions is a good subject for litigation, and my legal friends may congratulate themselves that a liberal amount of courting is before them, and even if no good comes from it to the community at large they may reap a profit.

So then the final determination of its hidden and uncertain meaning must come from the judicial branch of the Government.

Mr. STEELE. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he thinks it is right to send a provision to the country inviting lawsuits.

Mr. DUNHAM. No; I do not, and I disapprove of such legislation.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I thought you were in favor of it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, Mr. Speaker, the fourth section provides, in the first part of it, that it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction.

I will not undertake to say what those three words, "in the aggregate," mean. I will leave it to any member of the committee, or any member of the House; but to reduce this to a supposed case, so that we may, in a measure, find out what it means, I understand this section to say that a line of railroad that charges 10 cents a bushel to take a car of corn from Chicago to Boston shall not charge 12 cents to take another car of corn from Chicago to Worcester in the State of Massachusetts, 44 miles west of Boston, and over the same line. I think there can be no question as to that. The general understanding has been by all parties, and even admitted as fair, that they could charge as much for taking a car of corn from Chicago to Worcester as they could for taking a car of corn from Chicago to Boston. I will say here the people of New England, at all times for the last ten years, have been perfectly satisfied if they had the same rates from the West as were given to Boston. The people of Springfield, Worcester, Nashua, Concord, Hartford, New Haven, Montpelier, and other points east of New York were perfectly satisfied if the rates were the same, even though the distances were not so great, but their objection came when those nearer to the place of shipment than Boston were compelled to pay more than Boston rates. This discrimination, it is understood, the authors of this bill seek to prevent, and it is believed they do not ask or do not mean to say that railroad companies may not charge as much from Chicago to Worcester as from Chicago to Boston over the same line.

Now, then, let us see what the rest of section 4 says:

> But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

This clause, in effect, says they shall not charge and shall not collect as much on a car of corn from Chicago to Worcester as they do from Chicago to Boston; and, as before, over the same line.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Does not the bill give them the right to charge——

Mr. DUNHAM. No; I think not.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Where it allows a railroad company to charge as much to Worcester as to Boston, does it not confer on the railroad company the right to charge to Worcester more than to Boston?

Mr. DUNHAM. I think not. I have stated that it was not intended to say they should not charge as much, but not any more. I do not think they have any such right under the clause of the bill the gentleman refers to. The bill says, in the first place, that they shall not charge more to Worcester than to Boston.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. But it says they may charge as much.

Mr. DUNHAM. No, it does not say that; but it says they can not charge more, leaving it to be inferred they may charge as much, and then comes in the next clause that in so many words says they shall not be authorized to charge as much to Worcester as to Boston.

Mr. CRISP. That is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. The bill provides "that this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance." Now, I am unable to see that that means anything but just what it says in plain English. It says distinctly that a railroad shall not charge as much for a car of corn from Chicago to Worcester as for a car of corn from Chicago to Boston. I think the bill is objectionable in that respect. It has two provisions in one section; one saying one thing, and the other another thing. At the proper time I shall move to recommit this bill to the committee of conference, with the hope that such motion may be ruled in order, and with the further hope that it may be returned to us without this fourth section.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. You can not make that motion.

Mr. DUNHAM. It can be made, but the question of its regularity may become an issue. We will try it at all events. I will say to the gentleman from New York that it has been held in another legislative body somewhat connected with this to be in order.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. No, it was held to be not in order.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. PETTIBONE. It was held to be in order by the Chair, but was voted down.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from Tennessee will examine the RECORD he will discover that I am correct.

I desire to say this, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the lower rate of freight, or a lower rate of freight on a long over a short haul that has been charged by railroad companies in the past fifteen years, has surely brought about favorable results to many sections of the United States. I admit that there may have been towns, there may have been counties or sections of the country, or classes of the people who have felt that they were injured because train-loads of property passed through their towns at a lower rate than they themselves were allowed to have; but as a general thing, and on the whole, I am confident the low long-haul charge has proved beneficial to the United States.

Now, the consuming sections of this country are largely in the East, and the Western States being the producing States, desire to reach the consuming regions of the East and also Europe with their products. The farther West you go if you have a mileage law, and I fear a part of the fourth section may be construed in that direction, the lower prices the farmer must expect for his property. Fifteen to twenty-five years ago it was claimed in the West, when we were paying 25 to 50 cents a bushel as freight on our grain to the East, that if we could reduce the freights the Western people would receive much more for their agricultural products. Since the time mentioned there has been a very large reduction in freight rates, and yet the farmer in the West is compelled to take less for his products. Possibly lower freights are of advantage to him now, but the consumer in the East has practically won the best results in the battle of freight reduction.

Fifteen years ago wheat would bring $1.25 per bushel in New York, and the Western farmer believed that if he could get the rate of freight reduced that instead of receiving a dollar for his wheat he would get $1.10. Freights have been reduced to a very low rate, and yet the farmer of the West does not get his $1 a bushel or anything like it. If, then, you pass a bill to compel the railroads to put up the through rates to local rates, then you are going to force the Western farmers to take still lower prices for their products.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. If it will not interrupt the gentleman in the course of his argument, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. DUNHAM. Very well.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman to give me his construction of that portion of the fourth section which reads as follows:

> That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for a longer than for a shorter distance.

What construction do you put on those words?

Mr. DUNHAM. The only construction, as I understand it, is that you can apply to the commissioners, and if you can satisfy them you ought to have the privilege of shipping property a longer distance at a lower rate than a shorter distance they are authorized to grant the concession. It is a question about which they are to be the judges. I might as well say here that many seriously question the propriety of putting such power into the hands of five men. Humanity is full of prejudices. Benefits to localities often influence such rulings among the fairest of men. I do not claim that this will be so with these commissioners; on the contrary, I believe otherwise, and am disposed to look for only the best results.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Then it gives the commission power to nullify the preceding portion of the section, and authorize the transportation company to charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul?

Mr. DUNHAM. Certainly, and that is one of the advantages of this bill as now constructed over the former Reagan bill. That was an absolute prohibition. It compelled every railroad company to charge practically mileage rates; and I claim that this bill, the fourth section of it, may be construed as a mileage law unless the commission exercise their power to allow a long haul at a cheaper charge than the short distance.

I was going on to say, Mr. Speaker, in regard to how the West has looked upon this reduction of freights and the danger we are liable to be in if we legislate so as to force the railroad companies to advance the through rates of freight. I can give you a few illustrations. For instance, through the past summer the railroad companies, six in number, have been competing for business at Minneapolis. These roads have been taking wheat from Minneapolis to Chicago as low as 4½ cents per bushel, a rate which was never expected to be reached, it being so much less than has prevailed for years before. I maintain, and the railroad officers tell me it is true, that if they were prevented from doing that—that is, unless they could continue to make low rates from competing points—they would be obliged to go back and charge local rates.

Gentlemen will understand that while these roads are competing in Minneapolis for business, they are driven, at times, to accept rates they would prefer to avoid. But if you go ten or fifteen miles out from the city of Minneapolis towards the lakes you will reach points on any one of these roads which are not competing points, and from such points they have been in the habit of charging higher rates on such freights than from the city of Minneapolis. I feel very sure that the railroad companies will not give up the local rates or bring them down to the through rates, simply because they can not live if all their business must be done at such sacrifices. The same kind of traffic was illustrated by the gentleman from Georgia yesterday, where 76 cents per hundred pounds is charged from New York to New Orleans, and $1 to Atlanta over the same line. It may be that when the railroad company transports property from New York to New Orleans at 76 cents a hundred pounds they do it at a loss and simply to compete with the waterways.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why do they transport it at all if they do it at a loss?

Mr. DUNHAM. I think the gentleman well understands the practice of railroads, factories, mills, and like institutions to keep in the market. A large manufacturing concern must run or discharge their men. Necessity may compel selling goods temporarily at some loss. They hope to get improvement in some other direction. Business men expect aid from railroads. Competition at times compels unreasonable concessions. In this New York and New Orleans shipment something for use of cars is better than lying idle, even though it may figure a temporary loss. The kind of freight will determine in this case whether 76 cents is a loss or not.

I have just given reasons why work is done at times at an apparent loss. Let me give another illustration. Twenty-five years ago sail vessels on the lakes occasionally obtained 25 cents per bushel to transport corn from Chicago to Buffalo. Within the last three years I have seen them chartered at less than 2 cents. Evidently the vessel was doing that at a loss so far as running expenses were concerned.

The owner when asked why he chartered said it was better for his vessel to be in use than rotting at the dock. If it was suggested that in some storm the vessel might be lost, the reply came: In that event the insurance company is my protector. Does not the gentleman know that many a passenger train makes its trips at a loss—not even passengers enough to pay its crew. What would the people on its line say if the officers of the road should say: We can not run to-day—not tickets enough sold to pay expenses? What is a railroad to do that is compelled to be idle or make a low rate of freight? The gentleman asks if it is right to transport property at a loss. It seems hard, but if it is necessary it may be right. There are so many questions that come into the consideration of such an issue that I must content myself with this explanation as an answer to the gentleman's question.

Now, let me give another practical illustration.

The heavy winter business from the West to the East decreases as spring approaches; demand for property checks; railroads discover their cars standing idle; accepting the situation, competition visible in the distance, they drop their prices; shippers no longer beg for cars, but declining railroad treasuries plead for income; the winter charge gives way, and shippers at a great business and competing point, like Chicago, dictate terms; a through rate from Chicago to seaboard points is made that would never be allowed if the entire business on the same line must be done for the same. I have known wheat to be shipped all rail from Chicago to the seaboard, thence by steamer to London, at less than 10 cents per bushel. Surely such a rate was an advantage to every farmer west of Chicago, and how could it harm any other in this country?

The English grower might complain, but no American would have the right.

Now, then, who will undertake to say that the low rate I have previously quoted of 4½ cents per bushel on wheat from Minneapolis to Chicago has not been beneficial to over one hundred millions of wheat raised in Minnesota, Dakota, Northern Iowa, and Nebraska? It not only applies to wheat, but to all grain and live-stock. Shippers in Chicago are complaining at this very time that Minneapolis, 500 miles farther from the seaboard, is given precisely the same rate as Chicago.

Here comes evidence of injustice to my own city, and yet it does not alter the fact that the Northwest has become the gainer. Probably Chicago more than gets even on other low rates—in fact a city with such natural advantages must share in the cheap long hauls. It is easy for commercial men to understand why such points must profit, but residents of non-competing localities are troubled to fathom the mystery. I admit the natural feeling, but the law of competition, coupled with supply and demand, is a great regulator.

The Reagan bill, as it passed the House, positively forced all places with great natural advantages down to the level of insignificant way stations. This bill would be the same except for the saving clause giving flexibility to the commission. Let the commission refuse necessary concessions, then it practically makes rates from Chicago to Worcester less than to Boston, less to Springfield than to Worcester, less to Albany than to Springfield, and so on with different roads all over the country.

I have read this fourth section very carefully, submitted it to several lawyers, and the majority agree that without consent of the commission we have a practical mileage law. All agree it would be better if the whole of the fourth section could be stricken out.

The last clause of section 1 covers the situation, as any one can see by reading. It says:

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

It can not be possible the conferees intended to report this bill in such shape as to invite litigation. If the part of section 1 that I have quoted will not answer for the fourth, then let us see if there is not virtue enough in the first part of section 3. It reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will allow me just there, I can state what I understand to be the purpose of those qualifying words to which he has just referred. The general rule is stated in the bill to be that a greater sum shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance. For fear some construing authority might determine that was a legislative indication that as much might be charged for the short as for the long distance we say, "but nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the charging as much for the short as for the long distance."

Mr. DUNHAM. I have already referred to the original intention of the Reagan bill to allow the shorter distance to be subject to the longer charge, and have insisted that the conference report practically denies it. Now, my Georgia friend tries to explain it, but there is nothing in this talk of "not authorizing." They not only can not charge more, but the commission and courts are informed that they are not to construe this section so that they may collect as much. Let us read it again. Here it is—

But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman read the language of that clause?

Mr. DUNHAM. It says:

But this shall not be construed as authorizing——

Mr. CRISP. That means, but this prohibition upon receiving more for a short than for a long haul shall not be construed as authorizing the charging as much. If it is reasonable to charge as much under the other provisions of the bill it may be charged, but that is left to the question of the reasonableness of the charge.

Mr. DUNHAM. You may, possibly, in connection with other sections of the bill bring in the question of reasonableness. But if you take that fourth section by itself you are forbidden, in the first place, to charge more from New York to Trenton than from New York to Philadelphia; and then you are told afterwards, in the same section, you shall have no authority to charge as much from New York to Trenton as from New York to Philadelphia.

The meaning of that provision may be for the courts to decide, but it is there. Now, it may be possible that, with this bill enacted into law, the railroad companies of this country will give up their local rates. If they do there is a chance for bankruptcy. How many railroads in this country are paying any dividends to their stockholders, at least fair dividends?

Mr. BUCHANAN. And there are very few of them without watered stock.

Mr. DUNHAM. The question of watered stock does not come in here. If they can not pay anything on watered stock then they can not pay reasonable dividends on any stock, watered or unwatered.

Now, if we are to lose the long-haul rate, and railroads, rather than surrender local rates, go back to the terms of years ago, it occurs to me that the West is liable to feel it more than the East. The people located in the far West will suffer the worst of all.

Let us look at this matter in connection with our exports of breadstuffs. We have a wheat-raising country; we must ship our surplus abroad. Western Europe, including the United Kingdom, is always a buyer. Russia, Chili, India, Australia, and the United States are always sellers. England is the heavy buyer, taking yearly more than all the other buying countries. India is her own province, and she uses it to drive other countries into low prices. The 6-cents-per-day harvest hand comes in contact with the American farmer. We must meet all competition, and low rates of freight from the great Western farms have been our salvation.

During the past six months we have exported some seventy-seven millions of wheat, and by the end of the Government year will probably have sent out nearly one hundred and fifty millions.

It so happens that the European crops of 1886 fell materially under 1885, leaving America in a more independent position as regards "supplying wants," and yet no gainer in prices. Australia is now harvesting. March will find India at the same work, so that sixty days hence our rivals will dictate and control the situation. Without some such disturbing cause as war we can not expect foreign buyers to raise their bids. If this bill forces an advance in freights, the farmer must be the sufferer. As wheat is affected so shall be other breadstuffs, while the great cattle and pork interests must share in any depreciation.

During the season of navigation property can be shipped from lake ports to seaboard at fair rates, but under what terms it shall be transported from distant farms to the lakes depends on the decision of railroads to abolish through rates or bring locals down. I maintain that the competition of railroads under the cheap long-haul rate has been an important factor in the great rate reduction that has taken place during the last twenty-five years; in fact, they forced down the water rates. Nothing is more certain than that if rail freights advance the water transportation will follow them. If European or eastern prices do no better the West must lose.

Any one familiar with the subject knows that the consumer usually beats the farmer, who must have money and must sell. How are goods shipped from the East to the West and South to be affected? If rates advance one or the other must give way. Often such disarrangements cut both ways. One thing is now certain, our farmers are suffering terribly under an era of low prices. I have a fear of the result, and yet my confidence in the success of Americans is unbounded. This may work out good results. If discriminations cease and railroads come to the point of treating all alike, then one grand thing will have been accomplished.

Before I pass from this through-rate matter I would like to call attention to the "across continent" business, that seems to me at this time to be just in its infancy. Abolish the cheap long haul and the new route from China and Japan must be surrendered. The business can not stand local rates, and the long ocean voyage must again come in play.

Take the shipment of goods from Boston to San Francisco, the freight divided as it is among seven roads. Each road simply connects an engine with the loaded car and delivers it to the next line. Must the local business of each road come to the through rate? Must each road keep men at each freight depot to handle every pound of freight and get no more for it than for the long haul?

But you say the commission can regulate all this. True, but will they always do it. Is not there a chance that they may at times yield to public clamor and arbitrarily refuse.

We have had the question of what "one line of road" means quite thoroughly discussed in other places, but it still is not understood and never will be until the courts pass upon it. It is claimed that roads starting from Kansas City, Omaha, and Saint Paul may each make contracts at different rates to New York via Chicago, and all the freight go from Chicago by the same line to New York. Therefore the same engine may haul from Chicago ten cars each from Kansas City, Omaha, and Saint Paul, and at entirely different rates, and yet these through rates have nothing to do with the local rates charged and collected east of Chicago. If this be true, then Saint Paul may ship at 25 cents per 100 pounds and yet 30 cents be charged on a shipment originating at Chicago.

Then again, we are told that if a rate of 10 cents per bushel on grain is made from Chicago to Buffalo it can not be raised from any other point on the main line. Suppose, however, that 60 miles east of Chicago a road only 10 miles long comes in from the north or south. We are told that from any point on that short road a rate may be made of 15 cents to Buffalo, even though the car goes with the Chicago car and behind the same engine to Buffalo. If this is not discrimination then I should like to have some one describe it.

I hope this bill, or the fourth section, will not be construed to allow an increase of evils, but surely its friends in their definition of its meaning have opened up schemes for its violation that ought to have been left to its enemies.

This bill prohibits rebates. The grain rate from the West to Boston and other New England points usually exceeds by 5 cents per 100 pounds the New York rate, but the practice is to allow a rebate of this sum on all grain exported—the proportionate figure being allowed on flour and provisions.

If the property is consumed in New England then the freight stands at 5 cents over New York. The bill, by its preventing rebates, prevents exportation of products from Boston.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says that in the case stated by him the rebate would be prohibited by this bill. I call his attention to section 2 of the bill, and I submit that, while certain rebates are prohibited, it does not contain a prohibition which would apply to such a case.

Section 2 of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 2. That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

Under "similar circumstances and conditions." Now, as I understand the terms of this section, the two cases which the gentleman has stated are not similar. In the one case the wheat is shipped from Chicago to Boston for domestic consumption, while in the other case it is shipped from Chicago to Boston for export, and would not be shipped there unless it could be shipped at the cheaper rate. Therefore the circumstances and conditions are not similar, and I ask the gentleman would not the rebate be authorized in such a case as the one stated by him under the provisions of this second section of the bill?

Mr. DUNHAM. The circumstances are not always similar. The grain starts from Chicago to Boston, and it is not known whether it is to be exported or not, but the railroad contractor says to the shipper: "If you do export this grain we will give you a rebate of 5 cents a hundred. You pay full rate—if, after arrival at Boston, you decide to export you shall have the rebate." Possibly this section may be construed as my colleague suggests. The commission may do so.

Mr. CRISP. Would it interrupt my friend if I should ask him another question?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not at all.

Mr. CRISP. Would the gentleman justify the practice of a railroad company which should determine its charge upon a shipment by the destination of the goods after leaving its line?

Mr. DUNHAM. I can not tell the gentleman whether they would justify it——

Mr. CRISP. I say, would the gentleman justify a practice of that sort?

Mr. DUNHAM. Do you mean a charge upon goods for export?

Mr. CRISP. I mean for any purpose. Would the gentleman justify a transportation company regulating its charges according to what is to be done with the property after it gets through transporting it?

Mr. DUNHAM. Commercial necessity might—

Mr. CRISP. I understood the gentleman to say that where grain is intended for export the railroad companies make a less charge for transportation over the entire line than if it were intended for consumption in New England.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is true. That is just what they do.

Mr. CRISP. Then, is not that a discrimination in favor of the export?

Mr. DUNHAM. It may be so accepted, and also be perfectly fair and proper, and for the benefit of the country.

Mr. CRISP. Ah! then, as I understand, the railroad companies are to determine their charges according to their ideas of what is for the general benefit of the country, and not according to the cost of transportation?

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman must understand that the principal exporting cities of the East are New York, Boston, Portland, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The railroad companies have been in more or less dispute as to what they call differential rates between the various cities. For instance, Philadelphia and Baltimore have for years demanded that they should have a less rate from the West than New York. New York has demanded that Boston should have a greater rate than New York, and the New England railroads, the haul being longer, have been perfectly willing to concede that the Boston rate should be a little more than the New York rate.

But when you come to the question of the exportation of grain, inasmuch as the difference in ocean freights from these various cities is practically nothing, if the Boston and Albany Railroad, for instance, is to get any part of a haul from the West to the seaboard, it must make a concession and get the roads West of them to join in the concession in order that they may get some business, and that the city of Boston and its vessel interest may have some of the benefit of the export trade. Therefore, they make a rate of freight from Chicago to the seaboard of, say, 22½ cents to Philadelphia, 25 cents to New York, and 30 cents to Boston. But when you come to the question of exports, then they have been in the habit of allowing a rebate to the man who ships by the way of Boston so as to put him on a par with the man who ships by way of New York. If they ship property to New England for consumption, they maintain their 30-cent rate to Boston; but if the commodity is destined to be exported, they allow a rebate, which places the Chicago shipper by way of Boston on a par with the man who ships by way of New York. What reasonable man will object to this?

Mr. CRISP. I trust the gentleman will pardon me for using so much of his time. I understood what the practice was, but my idea in propounding my interrogatory was to ascertain whether the gentleman could justify the practice.

Mr. DUNHAM. I justify it. I think it proper.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the gentleman whether he thinks it right——

Mr. DUNHAM. I do.

Mr. CRISP. For the benefit, if you please, of the city of Boston or other cities——

Mr. DUNHAM. It is not for the benefit of the city of Boston exclusively.

Mr. CRISP. I so understood.

Mr. DUNHAM. No, sir; it simply puts Boston as an exporting city on a par with New York as an exporting city.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the gentleman what business it is of the railroad companies whether Boston is an exporting city or not. Is it just that people of our own country, in Boston or elsewhere, who buy goods for their own consumption should be discriminated against by the railroad in favor of the foreign trade?

Mr. DUNHAM. They are not discriminated against; their rate is not interfered with. It is just and for the benefit of the whole country to encourage the exportation of our products in all legitimate ways; and if in order that Boston as an exporting or seaboard city may be placed even with the cities of New York and Philadelphia the railroad companies are pleased to allow a rebate to shippers by way of Boston (the shipper paying the same price for the property as the man who ships by way of New York) it is certainly for the benefit of the country, and it is not an injury to American consumers.

Mr. CRISP. One more suggestion, and I will refrain from further interrupting the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Before the gentleman from Georgia asks a further question, I would like to put to my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] an inquiry which may be regarded as a twin question to that of the gentleman from Georgia. I wish to ask whether this rebate of 5 cents on wheat to be exported is not eminently just to the man who grows the wheat in the far West.

Mr. DUNHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then, if the first charge is "reasonable," is not the larger charge which is imposed when the grain is not to be exported robbery upon the producer in the West?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not at all; because he sells on the basis of export rate from New York.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. The railroads undertake to establish a tariff; that is it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the lower rate is reasonable compensation in the one case, why should not the railroad companies be satisfied with it in the other?

I explained this when referring to the differential rates between Philadelphia, New York, and Boston.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow me just one further suggestion. The whole difficulty which arises in the transportation problem is, as suggested by gentlemen here, due to the fact that the railroad companies lose sight of their legitimate function and office—to transport at equal rates freight presented to them under substantially similar circumstances and conditions. They seek to play the part of Providence by determining what shall be the value of wheat in one place and corn in another.

Mr. DUNHAM. No, sir.

Mr. CRISP. A matter with which they have nothing to do.

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, just let me tell you right here how it happens. Suppose ten millions of bushels are to go from Chicago to Europe. There are railroads running to New York and railroads running to Boston which are asking for that shipment. The owner of that wheat says, "I must deliver this grain in London or Liverpool, but I do not care which way I ship it. Now, you can take part of it to New York, you can give your New York people your laborers, your warehouse men, your insurance companies the benefit of it passing through that city." He says to the railroad company which runs from Chicago to Boston, "If you desire to have part of this business go over your road for export so that you may give the Boston laborers pay for handling a part of it, so your Boston warehouses may receive something for transferring it, so you may put Boston and Boston interests in all respects even with New York very well, but you must not charge me any more for Boston than New York charges me. I can not have anything to do with your claim for Boston unless your road from Chicago to Boston makes the same charge as the road from Chicago to New York, because I must put this wheat in London or Liverpool at one price, and I can not pay you more than I pay to New York." For instance, if the Boston and Albany Railroad wants to haul a part of this property so Boston may have the benefit of exporting it, then it must get the railroads west of Albany to make concession so as to put the two cities of Boston and New York on an equal footing in carrying the grain from Chicago for exportation.

Mr. ROWELL. Would not the provision against pooling by bringing them into competition bring these railroads to an agreement without the necessity for this, so that the rate by Boston to London or Liverpool would be the same as by New York?

Mr. DUNHAM. That is not pooling.

Mr. ROWELL. But suppose the rate is 30 cents from Chicago to New York and 25 cents from Chicago to Boston?

Mr. DUNHAM. That is not pooling, but the rate agreed upon by the railroad as to the charge it will make.

Mr. ROWELL. What is that but pooling?

Mr. DUNHAM. No, it is nothing more than the rate agreed upon by the railroad.

Mr. ROWELL. It will compel them to come to some agreement by which they will charge the same rate or do without the business.

Mr. DUNHAM. By means of the rebate they practically make the same rate to the exporter.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, if, upon the statement he made a few minutes ago in reference to rebate to Boston, that does not give to the railroad company the right to assess, without legislation, a protection to the extent of 5 cents in favor of Boston?

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest that matter be postponed until they bring up their bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Does it not do that thing?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not in the line the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Does it not amount to that?

Mr. DUNHAM. That will more properly be a legitimate question when you discuss the tariff.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Does not the gentleman know he and others would not let us discuss the tariff?

Mr. DUNHAM. Now, the gentleman from Kansas will not claim for one moment it is not for the benefit of the farmer in his State to get as low rates as possible to the seaboard, and he will not claim, nor will he or his farmers care whether their wheat goes by Boston or New York.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the rate of freight is a certain rate from Kansas City it makes no difference to the man who grows the wheat whether the railroads allow a rebate of 5 per cent. or not. That comes out of the railroad company and not out of the farmer. The price to the latter is the same.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the difference in distance between Chicago and Boston and Chicago and New York?

Mr. DUNHAM. About 50 miles farther to Boston than to New York.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I thought it was more than that.

Mr. DUNHAM. No.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Assume that the distance from Kansas City to New York is 200 miles less than from Kansas City to Boston. Assume that the plant or investment of the trunk line from Kansas City to New York is the same per mile and the cost of operation is the same per mile as the trunk line from Kansas City to Boston, then, clearly, the New York line could afford to give, while making reasonable profit, a less rate than the Boston line. Is not that clear?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes; and they often do so, as I have shown, and your farmer gets the benefit of the inside rate.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If the Boston trunk line makes reasonable rate by hauling at 5 cents less than the New York line, or for a greater distance for the same price, which is the same thing, then the New York line is making an unreasonable rate which the farmer in my State pays?

Mr. DUNHAM. Not at all; for on the theory of the gentleman he might carry the rate of freight down to nearly nothing.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But it is perfectly clear because the two trunk lines have the same investment, the same facilities, and the same cost of carriage, and their pretension they are giving this lesser rate out of philantrophy to the people is something so audacious, so perfectly absurd [applause]——

Mr. DUNHAM. Does it occur to the gentleman from Kansas that he is taking up my time? [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That I am surprised my friend should make any such proposition.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to say this, in response to the gentleman from Kansas, that if the rate of freight is 30 cents a hundred from Kansas City to New York and 35 cents a hundred from Kansas City to Boston, and the price of wheat, the selling price, in Kansas City is 60 cents a bushel, the farmer having sold his wheat at that price, it makes no difference to him whether the rate is 25 or 30 cents to New York or Boston. It does not benefit him or injure him. If the railroad companies see fit to rebate their freight rates between themselves between Boston and New York what effect, I would ask the gentleman, does that have upon the farmers or what business is it of theirs?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Oh, I know it is generally considered to be nobody's business to inquire into anything that a railroad company does——

Mr. CRISP. The farmer is not benefited by the rebate and gets no benefit under the circumstances suggested in the question of the colleague of the gentleman from Illinois a few moments ago; and hence it is immaterial to the farmer whether the wheat goes to New York or to Boston.

Mr. DUNHAM. It is immaterial to the farmer whether it goes to Europe via Boston or New York.

Mr. CRISP. I am speaking now as between New York and Boston.

Mr. DUNHAM. It would be immaterial. But one thing is true, that there is no necessity for the railroad companies doing anything in particular to build up one city at the expense of another; and if they are willing to concede among themselves a rate that will place New York and Boston and Philadelphia on a par and give each one a fair share of business, it certainly can be no injury to the farmer or any one else.

Mr. CRISP. Except that they must not do that to burden the local people along the line. That is the point I desire to make.

Mr. DUNHAM. Nobody objects to that statement.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me another question?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir; I will yield for a question only.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. You must remember that you introduced me into this discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNHAM. Very well; I will hear the question.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is not the reason why a lower rate is given by the railroads to Boston than to New York because of the competition between Boston and New York; that is, between the different roads terminating in those cities?

Mr. DUNHAM. The rate to Boston is actually higher than to New York, except in case of exportation; then they are made the same.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is not competition the chief reason?

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, they both want business; there is no question about that.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I fancy that is the chief reason they make an agreed rate, common to both cities, because if they do not the New England road will compete. It is for the benefit of the farmers of the West to have a lower rate by reason of competition, since these farmers really pay the freight.

Mr. DUNHAM. No one here will undertake to claim, I apprehend, that it is for the good of the people or of the railroads that these railroad wars should go on; and when the rates have been agreed upon between the great trunk lines it has saved the wars. I have seen grain taken from Kansas City to Chicago for 5 cents per bushel; but the gentleman from Kansas will not say that it is not at an absolute loss to the railroad companies.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then why do they take it?

Mr. DUNHAM. Because they get into a war of rates.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The road should not have the right to get into a war of rates so that the people are made to suffer. They are not an irresponsible set of pirates, are they? [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman never knew an instance where the people suffered when rate wars prevail. On the contrary, both producer and consumer reap profits, and the pirates, as the gentleman politely terms the companies, make the loss.

My time is about up and I must decline to be interrupted further. There is a class of rebates, Mr. Speaker, to which I object, and which no man who is disposed to be reasonable or to treat others fairly would consent to. A rate is established from Chicago to New York, at 25 cents per hundred, and a private cut is given to a particular individual. That ought to be prohibited, and so far as this bill prohibits it I favor it. Then as to pooling. A pool itself I have no objection to; but it is the private cut of a pool for particular corporations, or for individuals, that we have good reason to object to, and so far as the bill prohibits that I am for it.

Now then, this bill the people imagine they want. I admit they want something. I admit that railroads have been guilty of unjust discriminations and of abuses, and that it is proper that legislation should be invoked to prevent it in the future, but I do not admit that in order to prevent discriminations or abuses it is necessary to pass laws that are so unreasonable as to tend to cripple the railroads. This commission bill is better, as it is, than nothing, and I think the people of the United States would rather have this than nothing. I know that the people of the city I have the honor in part to represent largely desire that we should have something; and merchants, some indeed of the officers of the railroads themselves, are willing to take this bill, and while I think it is inconsistent in places, yet I am committed to the commission features of the bill because in the first session of this Congress I voted to amend the Reagan bill by inserting the Cullom bill. In the absence, then, of something better than this, in the absence of what I would like to have, and following what seems to be the wishes of my constituents, I shall vote for it, but believe I ought to say that I am in doubt as to its accomplishing the purposes expected.

I believe that we have reached that point in this country where we need something to be done. I believe that many rates and many rebates and many drawbacks have been unreasonable. I believe that the railroad companies in many cases are doing very much to the benefit of the country. I believe that the long and the short haul question has annihilated distances. I do not believe that you will ever see the day again under such a bill as this when you can ship the grain from the West to the East or to Europe by rail to the seaboard as low as you can to-day; because I do not believe the railroad companies will throw aside their local rates and bring them down to the through rates.

I do not believe that the flour makers of Minneapolis, who are getting flour to-day to the seaboard cheaper than the flour makers in Chicago, can have that continued under this bill. For I tell you that, as a matter of fact, flour is taken to-day from Minneapolis to the seaboard cheaper than you can get it from Chicago or Milwaukee. It is the long haul that does it, and the long and short haul is about all that there is in this bill. I fear the great agricultural sections of the West and South will suffer somewhat by the enforcement of this law.

With so much competition as I have already detailed, I think it doubtful if we can sustain our present farm prices, provided we are forced to higher rates of freight.

If the definition of the "line of road" that has been given proves correct then, from many points this bill will not interfere, and the country sections that have so long pressed for this legislation will have gained practically nothing.

I promised others part of my time, but find I have occupied almost the whole of it.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Before the gentleman from Illinois yields the floor I would like to ask him a question as to this commission. I desire to ask him how he construes these words:

That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances.

Now, I ask the gentleman this question: Suppose this bill receives the signature of the President and becomes a law to-morrow, must the common carrier, under the long-haul portion of this provision, apply to the commission before the freight is shipped over its line to receive the benefit? Or does it apply to the case in which the freight has been shipped?

Mr. DUNHAM. He would hardly be allowed to violate the law first and then ask permission to do it.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. The case I suggest is this. Suppose $100 is charged for a car-load of freight from here to Chicago and it is paid, will the railroad receiving that large freight for that long distance go to the commission seeking to bite its own nose off to ask to reduce this freight on the long haul and remit to the shipper the amount over and above what the commission would allow?

Mr. DUNHAM. I think it is really an unknown question, and no man can answer what the result of this bill will be. I have only stated what I thought it would be so far as the West is concerned. I do not think this bill will very much affect the Eastern States, but I do believe that we must lose on our property in the West to get even with it on this theory that the railroad company will not bring down their local rates to their through rates, and therefore will advance their through rates. In the summer season, when navigation is open, it will not make the difference that it does in the winter. Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas may send their grain to the lake cities cheaper, and get more in the summer season than in the winter. But this vast eastern country must have a large quantity of grain and provisions in the winter season, and if they will not advance their prices, then the West must feel the loss. Prices may be determined by the one who can hold out the longest.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. And yet you will vote for it?

Mr. DUNHAM. I have already explained my position. If the railroad companies determined to continue their low through rates and bring their local rates to them, then we shall lose nothing by this bill. The question is what the railroads will decide to do. I do not believe that the railroad companies can do business and pay their expenses if they are obliged to give up their local rates.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman explain to the House why it would cost a railroad company any more to transport this freight at one season than at another?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman has just said that in summer time there would be no complaint, but in winter there might be.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will go back a little. Twenty-five years ago the railroad men never dreamed that they could carry grain all the way from the West to the East; so in summer the grain went by water, by the lakes and canal, and in winter the West was practically closed up so far as transportation of grain was concerned. Now, by improved devices and by the general progress in railroading, by building cars that carry six or seven hundred bushels, instead of three hundred bushels, by using steel rails and engines of double the old power, they carry a vast quantity of grain to the seaboard, and are able to carry it at 25 cents a hundred from Chicago to New York, instead of 60 cents a hundred, which was the charge only twelve years ago.

Mr. CRISP. When the gentleman said that in summer the transportation would be satisfactory to the farmers, but not in winter, I understood him to mean that it would be satisfactory in summer because then the water-ways were open and could compete.

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes; but the gentleman is aware that water navigation has always been the cheapest.

Mr. CRISP. But that in the winter time it would not be satisfactory, because the railroads would then have a monopoly and would put up rates.

Mr. DUNHAM. Oh, no; the multiplicity of roads has about disposed of the monopoly cry. In the summer season the farmers would have but a short haul, from Iowa for instance, to Chicago, and then the grain could go by water to the Eastern cities; but in the winter it would have to go entirely by rail if it went at all; and, therefore, if the through rate was advanced the farmer must lose by it. In addition, the gentleman must well know that storms and blockades render railroad movements more expensive than in summer.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DUNHAM. My time has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I think the time of the gentleman should be extended.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I must object to any extension of time.

Mr. BYNUM was recognized, and yielded three minutes to Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in summer time much of the grain goes by rail from Kansas City by way of Saint Louis to the East, and the railroads that carry it are not losing anything either.

Mr. DUNHAM. Perhaps not on the long haul, but they might if doing the local at same rate. The railroads do now take the stuff from Kansas City to the seaboard on a low rate for the long haul, but if they were compelled to carry freight from every little station between Kansas City and the seaboard at the same rate, then they would not make such a rate for the long haul.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose or intention to take up the time of the House in a lengthy discussion of the provisions of this bill. It would be impossible for me to enter into such a discussion, because I have not given the subject that careful study and thought which would be necessary in order to present the subject in all its phases. For a great many years this question has been before the country, has been discussed by the people, has been before Congress, has been discussed before the committees of this House, has been discussed in this House, and it seems to me that the ground has been gone over so often that it is almost impossible to present anything new upon the question, or to present any reason that has not been already advanced in favor of this measure, or any objection which has not been made in opposition to it.

Mr. Chairman, I regard this legislation at best, as experimental. I believe that no question has ever been examined more carefully, or has received more attention from any committee than this question has received from the Committees on Commerce. We have heard it discussed by the ablest representatives of the railroad companies and by those who are in favor of this character of legislation. Those discussions have been printed; they have been circulated; they have been read; and yet we are no nearer a solution of the question than we were ten, or even five, years ago.

The demand for legislation upon the subject by the people remains as great as it has been for a number of years, and the only thing we can do now is to pass this measure and trust to the future to remedy any mistakes that we may make.

There are three provisions of this bill that meet with some opposition, and I believe they are the only provisions that have received attention to any great extent in the discussion either in this or in the other branch of Congress. They are, first, the provision which prohibits pooling; second, the provision in regard to the long and the short haul; and, third, the provision which allows the commission, in certain cases, to grant the privilege to haul the long distance at a less rate than is charged for the shorter distance.

I believe that these three provisions are the only ones which have received any extended consideration at the hands of the members who have engaged in this discussion.

In regard to the question of pooling, we should look at it not in the light of the past, but in the light of the future. We should look at it in view of the conditions and surrounding circumstances after the other provisions of this bill shall have been enacted into law. Suppose we should strike out the provision in regard to pooling; suppose we should pass the bill without that provision. In that case I undertake to say the other provisions of the bill will prevent such a war between the railroad companies, such a cutting of rates between competing lines, as have been engaged in by these corporations, and which, it is claimed by them, are injurious alike to shippers and the companies, and which it is insisted can only be prevented by pools.

It is claimed that the pools which have been formed by railroad companies have been made for the purpose of maintaining a stability of reasonable rates, and not for the purpose of advancing them; have been for the purpose of preventing a war of rates, or a cutting of rates to such an extent that freights and passengers would really have been carried for a less sum than the companies could afford. We all admit that such wars have often been engaged in by competing lines. Would it be possible for the railroad companies to engage in such wars, would it be possible that such things should take place after the other provisions of this bill have been enacted into a law? I do not think it would, because the companies will be compelled to publish their rates, and can not advance them without giving ten days' notice. They will be slow to reduce their rates to such figures as will result in a loss when they know they can not restore them for ten days. Any great reduction of rates would probably require a complete change of schedule along the entire length of the line. Consequently, I think the other provisions of this bill will prevent a reduction of rates, and especially a war of rates, even should the provisions against pooling be eliminated. Now, if the other provisions of the bill have a tendency to maintain a stability of rates, is there any danger of pooling for the purpose of advancing rates to an unreasonable point? I think there will be. I think, after the other provisions of this bill are adopted, the railroad companies, if they are permitted to pool will do so, not for the purpose of maintaining reasonable rates, but for the purpose of advancing them, especially on the long hauls, in order to maintain high freights on short hauls.

Therefore, I believe that the provision which prevents pooling should be retained in the bill and be adopted with the other provisions.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. There are certain lines of railroad in this country which have great natural advantages over other lines. A mutual pooling of the tonnage, which would not interfere with rates, would enable the main trunk lines having these advantages to distribute this tonnage equally among lines which topographically have not the same advantages. Does the gentleman get my idea?

Mr. BYNUM. I do. I understand the pool to be a division of traffic or rates between different competing lines.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir; between lines some of which have natural advantages over others. The maintenance of rates would not distribute the tonnage to a line which was inferior in respect to natural advantages; whereas if the companies were allowed to pool the tonnage, it would not interfere with the rates and would give to certain lines which do not possess equal natural advantages with others, a portion of the tonnage. In other words, the question is whether this measure legislates for "the survival of the fittest."

Mr. BYNUM. I understand the pooling arrangement to be this: The trunk lines are willing to grant a certain division of freights to other roads which can carry the freight between the same points, but which have not the natural advantages for doing so; that is to say, a division of freights in a certain ratio is agreed upon between competing lines, so as to prevent a reduction of rates. In short, to prevent a road which is not the direct or natural route from cutting under those which are such routes.

Mr. SCOTT. That is it.

Mr. BYNUM. I believe the other provisions of this bill will prevent anything of that kind, even though you might strike out the provision in regard to pooling.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me put a case to the gentleman. Suppose I am a shipper of cattle from Chicago to New York. There are certain lines which, owing to their alignment, their grades, their length, are able, on account of these natural advantages, to take the entire cattle transportation from Chicago to New York city. There are other lines which are a little more circuitous and a little longer. As a shipper, I should always be inclined to send my cattle over the line having the shortest and most direct route; so that the longer and more circuitous line gets none of that traffic, unless the company having the natural advantages agrees to divide that cattle transportation with the other lines.

Mr. BYNUM. I understand that the evil which the railroads desire to guard against is this: While the shipper, if the rates were the same, would naturally select the route having the greatest natural advantages, the shortest and quickest line, still there is danger that the road which lacks such advantages may cut under and bring about a war of rates, and the natural routes or lines are willing to grant a division of the traffic, to concede a certain portion of the freights to the lines having less advantages in order to prevent a reduction.

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. BYNUM. I want to answer the gentleman's question as I understand it. I understand the object to be to prevent those lines which do not command the natural routes between certain points from cutting under those which do command such routes. Now, I say the line which has not the advantages of the natural route will not be able to cut under the others, because it will be compelled to fix and publish its rates and can not raise them except upon ten days' notice.

Mr. SCOTT. Then the line which does not command the natural route will get no part of the business.

Mr. BYNUM. It has no business with any part of it at the expense of the shippers. Let the traffic take its natural channel.

Mr. SCOTT. Then the other line will monopolize all the traffic, and the line having inferior natural advantages will be destroyed.

Mr. BYNUM. There is no danger of monopoly so long as there is competition.

Mr. ROWELL. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: By means of pooling and by sending freight through an unnatural channel, thus insuring a reasonable compensation to the company which has a round-about route, is not the road having command of the natural channel enabled to charge an unreasonable compensation?

Mr. BYNUM. I think that is true. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. Otherwise they would not pool.

On the question of a long and short haul, a great many instances have been cited, a great many illustrations have been given, where it may work a hardship, and for that reason, probably, the provision was incorporated in the bill giving the commissioners the right to relax this rule in certain cases. Take the case, for instance, cited by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] yesterday, where the rates from New York to Atlanta were greater than from New York to New Orleans. I merely take that case as it furnishes a basis for the argument. It can not and will not be contended by any person who opposes the passage of this bill that railroad companies will and do carry freights for a less amount than they can afford; or, in other words, that they will carry freights at losing rates. So the question comes up at once, if they can afford to carry freights from New York to New Orleans for 75 cents a hundred, they can afford to carry them from New York to Atlanta for 75 cents a hundred, because it is only half the distance. If they can make a reasonable profit for carrying the longer distance they can afford to carry the shorter distance for the same amount of money.

In answer to the objection of the gentleman that this bill will prohibit them from charging as much for the shorter as for the longer distance, I say that is incorrect. The provision which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] cited, which reads as follows: "But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance," was inserted in the bill no doubt by the conferees for the reason that they feared that the provisions of the bill might be construed to authorize railroad companies to charge as much for a shorter as for a longer distance, even though the rate for the shorter might be an unreasonable one. That is, when the charge for the shorter distance was unreasonable it should be held illegal under the other provisions of the act, notwithstanding it might be as low as the rate for a longer distance. It simply leaves the question to be determined whether the amount charged for the shorter distance is a reasonable rate, notwithstanding it may be as low as the rate charged for a longer distance.

If it is a reasonable rate to charge the same amount for the shorter as for the longer distance, then, under the provisions of the bill, they have the right to do so; but if it is unreasonable, then, under the other provisions of the bill, they will not have the right to do so.

It will not be contended, as I stated before, that the railroad companies are carrying freights for longer hauls at losing rates, and that they now insist on the privilege of doing so. The argument in favor of such a proposition is something like the shoe-dealer who said he was selling his shoes at a loss of 25 cents a pair, and when asked how he could afford to do that, he said "that if he did not sell so many pair he could not afford it." [Laughter.] It is on that same principle that the railroad companies contend that they are carrying freights for a longer distance at a losing rate, and that they must continue to do so because the more they can carry the cheaper they can make the rates to intermediate points. I think, therefore, it is only a reasonable restriction to provide in this bill that they shall not receive more for a shorter than for a longer distance.

I know of no company, although I have not investigated the facts thoroughly, that now indulges extensively in this practice. I am satisfied that there is much less complaint of this evil now than a few years ago. True competition and increased railroad facilities have remedied to a great extent this matter in the last few years. I do not think that it is necessary for any railroad company to make such unjust discriminations. The power to discriminate against intermediate points is certainly great enough under the terms and limitations of the bill. Shippers who are without competition, who are at the mercy of a single corporation, are certainly entitled to some protection against the arbitrary power of these monopolies. I am firmly of the opinion that these corporations can and will manage successfully their roads under the provisions of this bill; and the greatest benefits I expect the people to derive from its enactment are that it will place all shippers, both great and small, upon terms of equality, and compel the companies to do equal and exact justice to all.

I come now to the other question, and I find that I am taking more time than I intended when I commenced. I intended merely to state my reasons and not attempt to make any argument. I come to the other question, about which I have more serious doubts, that is, the provision which allows the commission, under any circumstances, to relax the stringency of the provision which prohibits the companies from charging less for a longer than for a shorter haul. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] when questioned on that point yesterday could give no instance of such an exception and which might call for the exercise of so dangerous a power. I can not conceive of any instance where that rule would be relaxed, or where that provision would be set aside by the commissioners, unless it be in cases of competition with water carriage; that is, where water carriage comes into competition with railroad carriage. Take the line from Chicago to New York; probably if they relax the provision in any case they would relax it there.

Mr. ROWELL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYNUM. No; not now. Take Chicago, take Saint Louis, take Cincinnati, take Louisville, to a greater or less extent they have competition by water-ways. Take the city of Indianapolis, one of the greatest railroad centers in the country, the largest inland town in the world, where we have spent enormous sums of money aiding in the construction of railroads, and in providing terminal facilites, and in the construction of a belt line, connecting all the lines, so that freights can be transferred from one to the other without the least difficulty and at small expense; take that city, located as it is, without competition from water-ways, is there not danger that there will be discrimination in favor of surrounding cities, and that Indianapolis will be made to suffer thereby.

I have greater fears of the effects of this provision than any other in the bill and for that reason, while I shall vote for its passage, it will not be without some misgivings. I shall vote for it because, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is demanded by the people whom I represent, and by the people in general, who will not be satisfied without some legislation upon the subject. Although, I repeat, I have great fears that a large portion of my constituency may be injured in some respects. I hope not, but if I am right—if evil consequences do follow the passage of this law—if any of its provisions work injustice to any locality or section of the country—I have sufficient confidence in the integrity and patriotism of Congress to believe that justice will hereafter be done. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois for his question.

Mr. ROWELL. The question I wanted to ask is this, whether at places where there is no water competition may there not be circumstances of return freight or other conditions that would not only authorize but demand a different rule from that laid down in the provision which you have been discussing?

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I will not undertake to answer as to the condition or circumstances under which there may be a necessity for changes of the rule, for I recognize the fact that with 128,000 miles of railroad with which we have to deal, representing $8,000,000,000 of capital, with an annual traffic of $800,000,000, that so many conflicting interests are likely to be involved that it is impossible to frame any law that will not work hardships in some instances.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Then the provision is proper under your own admission.

Mr. BYNUM. No; I do not admit that. That provision goes further than we ought to go in the beginning; it is clothing the commission with too great a power. When I say that it is difficult to frame a law upon this subject which will not, in some instances, work a hardship, I have reference to the other provisions of the bill as well as to this extraordinary power with which the commission is clothed to suspend the operation of the provision in regard to long and short hauls.

I now desire to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER].

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 2944) making appropriation for the jetties in Charleston Harbor.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. 10242) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate, Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 18, 1887.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of five members of the Senate and eight members of the House of Representatives be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of holding in 1892, in commemoration of the discovery of America, an international exhibition of the industries and products of all nations; and, if such exhibition should be deemed expedient, to consider the time, place, circumstance, and general plan thereof, and to report by bill or otherwise.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have just reason to feel gratified that after ten years or more of continuous efforts to enact a law to regulate interstate commerce they at last are about to succeed, for I take it for granted that this conference report already adopted by the Senate will meet a like fate in this House.

This result, Mr. Speaker, will be most satisfactory. It will inspire renewed confidence among the people in their Representatives in Congress. Year after year, session after session, the railroad magnates, through their attorneys and lobbyists, have succeeded in defeating all legislation upon the subject of interstate commerce.

The best legal, oratorical and lobby talent has ever been at their disposal. Session after session, for weeks and months they appeared before the Committee on Commerce, presenting the most elaborate arguments why bills for the regulation of interstate commerce should not pass. They always had the advantage because the people, the farmers, the shippers, and the merchants had not the organization nor the means to employ the high-priced talent which the railroad corporations can always command. By the most ingenious arguments they always succeeded in impressing upon the minds of many Representatives that great disaster to the commerce of the country would follow any such legislation.

In the darkest colors they painted the consequences of what they were pleased to term "demagogical and suicidal laws." Everybody who advocated laws for the regulation of railroads was called a demagogue.

I was a member of the Committee on Commerce in the Forty-seventh Congress. I listened for weeks to the arguments of the greatest corporation lawyers in the land, and I must admit that I became almost frightened—I was younger, greener, and more unsophisticated then than I am to-day [laughter]—I became almost frightened at the prospect of utter ruin which would befall the Western farmer and business man should the interstate-commerce bill pass.

The picture was a gloomy one. No more railroads would be built. No longer would grain, flour, and other Western and Southern products find a profitable Eastern market. Lands would become almost valueless, farmers and business men would be bankrupted, and general ruin would prevail. These railroad lawyers always protested against that their opposition was due to their connection with the railroads, but came solely from the deep interest they felt in the general welfare of the dear public; and they said that, in fact, the railroads cared but very little. I must confess they acted well, kept up a sober face, and almost created the impression as if they really believed what they professed.

Boards of trade and other guileless commercial bodies were influenced by their peculiar methods to protest against the passage of the Reagan bill, which was the most conspicuous one, knowing full well that its defeat would sound the death-knell to similar measures. Every effort, open and secret, was brought into action, and the railroads were always successful, and every bill for the regulation of interstate commerce was defeated. Meanwhile the discriminations of the railroads, their extortions, the Standard Oil Company outrage, the coal combines, and other notorious and crying evils went on, merrily and uninterruptedly.

The railroads felt serene and safe in the sweet consciousness of their ability to continue their successful opposition ad infinitum, and I know that many members of Congress even, and a great portion of the people of the United States, had given up all hope to ever be able to correct the many abuses of the railroad management of the United States, and became resigned to what seemed the inevitable, namely, unconditional surrender of the people to the power, the greed, the avarice, the extortion, the iniquity, the injustice, the tyranny of these railroad corporations.

I therefore said, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the United States have reason to congratulate themselves that at last they will be able to assert their supremacy over these powerful monopolies. A bright ray of hope is at last breaking through the dark clouds that have been hovering over us.

For myself, Mr. Speaker, I had never given up hope, although I had not a great deal of that useful article, but still I clung to the belief that the people would triumph in the end, and that patience and perseverance would finally win.

In a speech in this House, some five years ago, I said that some day the people, that mighty giant, would awaken, and, springing to his feet, with one fierce blow would crush the thieves who had rifled his pockets while he was asleep.

The time has come. The day of judgment has arrived. The people have had their eyes opened; they are wide awake. They are determined at last that they will be the masters of their creatures, these ingrates who have amassed colossal fortunes by cheating and defrauding those who have been so generous and lenient.

The struggle has been fierce. Arrayed against the people have been the millions and millions of the gold of gigantic corporations, all bound together by a fellow-feeling produced by one common interest, spurred on by one common impulse, to defeat all measures that threatened the supremacy of their omnipotent power. The passage of this bill will be the greatest triumph the people have achieved in many years.

I do not claim that this bill is perfect in every particular, but this is no good reason why it should not pass.

What bill is——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALDWELL was recognized and yielded three minutes to Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. GUENTHER. Should the law prove to be too harsh or unjust to the railroads, or should its operation disturb any of the business interests of the country, after a fair trial has been given it, the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, will make such changes as will do justice to all concerned.

The people of the United States do not seek vengeance upon the railroads. They do not wish to retaliate for wrongs inflicted upon them in the past. All they want is fair play, "with malice towards none, with charity for all."

To amend the bill in the future in the direction indicated will be a very easy task, because we will then meet with the hearty co-operation of the railroads, while heretofore we have encountered their powerful and stubborn opposition. I have no prejudice against railroads if properly conducted, but I maintain that, being common carriers, having received extraordinary rights and concessions from the people—the people have a right to demand that their charges shall be reasonable and equal, and that excessive rates and unjust discriminations will not be tolerated.

I also assert as my candid belief that the railroads themselves will be better off in the end if all their charges and the general conduct of their business is regulated by law. I wish we could have had the time and the experience to pass a bill which would leave no doubt in our minds as to its perfection, and its just operation to both the people and the railroads. But as we have neither the time at this hour of the session, nor have we the knowledge gained by experience, and as we may not again, in years to come, have a chance to vote on a conference report on an interstate-commerce bill, I sincerely trust that the report will be adopted without amendment.

Bear in mind that the people have spoken in no uncertain tones. They demand some legislation to correct the many abuses to which they have been subjected by the railroads, and their demands are just.

Pass the bill as it has come from the conference committee, and you may rest assured that all the calamities that are predicted by its opponents will prove mere phantoms which will disappear like darkness before the rising sun as soon as the law goes into operation.

Let us pass this bill, imperfect as it may be, but vastly better than no bill at all; and then let us correct any defects and imperfections after the law has been given a fair test in its practical workings. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, the bulk of our interstate-carrying trade is now and for many years has been in the hands of our great railroad companies. These companies, representing millions of capital, have for years been accustomed to pay little or no heed to the wants or wishes of their patrons, the producers, but seem, in the main, to have been chiefly governed by their own selfish greed and rapacity. The rights of individuals, business interests and communities have at times been utterly ignored and disregarded; nay, more cruelly and ruthlessly trampled upon and destroyed with a cold-blooded indifference and obliviousness as transcendent as it was unreasonable and malignant.

When in the early '70's the people—especially of the West and Northwest—commenced to cry out against this growing evil and to deliberate upon modes of relief, they were met at the very threshold by the claim on the part of the railway companies that their business was of that peculiar character that it did not tolerate and could not thrive under any kind of legislative control, and that their rights, such as they construed them, were of that vested and sacred character under the Constitution that no legislative power could constitutionally reach out to regulate or control them in the least degree. In other words, that having acquired their charters and rights of way, they were, as to all else, above and beyond all law.

The Dartmouth College case was made the basis and groundwork for all such claims. Could Marshall and Webster have heard how much of iniquity there was attempted to be justified under this case they would have no doubt been as astonished as were our unsophisticated grangers. At the early stage of the controversy between the railroads and the people, about the only rule of law the former would admit was that rates ought to be reasonable; but there was not much concession even in this, as they coupled it with the further assertion that they themselves were the best, if not the sole, judges of what was reasonable.

And so the railroads, practicing extortion and unjust discrimination, while continuing to taunt the people with a want of power to effect a change, aroused a popular sentiment and feeling on the subject, which still exists unabated and unsatisfied, and justly so till this bill passes. In their first efforts to obtain relief the people applied to their own State Legislatures, and these, by various acts—some wise and effective, others crude and abortive—attempted to regulate and control the railways. All such legislation was vigorously questioned and fought by the railways through all the courts from the lowest up to the Supreme Court of the United States; and for a long time the people had grave fears whether our highest court would award them any power in the premises at all, but finally the gloomy doubt was removed, when, in 1876, our Supreme Court, in the case of Munn vs. Illinois (94 U. S. S. C. R., p. 113), substantially declared that—

It is a power inherent in every government to regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other, and the manner in which each shall use his own property; and this power includes the right to regulate common carriers and to fix their rates. When the owner devotes his property to a public use or public employment, he grants the public an interest in such use or employment, and must, to the extent of such interest, submit to public control.

And to the same effect was the much earlier (New Jersey) case of Messenger vs. Railroad Company (7 Vroom, 407), decided in 1873. And ever since the Munn case there never has been any doubt, among reasonable men, of the power of our State Legislatures and of Congress—each within their respective and proper spheres—to regulate and control common carriers in State or interstate commerce, as the case may be.

This Munn case and the Granger Railway cases on the heels of it had a soothing and quieting effect. The people had got maddened and exasperated by the denial of all right and power, and so had undoubtedly in some cases gone to legislative extremes. But this judicial admission of full and plenary legislative power in the premises mollified the popular impulse. The sense of power made the people more moderate in the exercise and use of it.

But while full legislative power was thus awarded to the States, it was found that by reason of our complex and dual system of Government, the relief given was bounded and circumscribed by State lines; and that Congress alone could afford relief for all that commerce and traffic which crosses State, territorial, or international lines, and which in volume and importance far exceeds purely local State commerce; and so the people with this knowledge and with ample and ever continuing grounds for seeking relief, have for the last dozen years or more been knocking at the doors of Congress for relief. And it is curious to note that not to this moment has there been any immediate prospect for national legislation on this all-important subject. Mr. Poor—he of railroad statistics—has kindly sent us, lately, a table showing, among other things, the reduction in rates of freight from 1865—a period of inflated paper currency standard for which he makes no allowance—to 1885.

Now, I am satisfied, if some other ingenious Poor would go to work to compile a table and list of the rights, privileges, and immunities claimed by the railway companies in respect to legislative discretion and legislative power from 1870 down to the present time, he would discover a much greater abatement and reduction in such claims than in the tariff rates. In 1870 and from thence down to the Munn case in 1876 all legislative power or discretion was denied to the States. And you, who were here in the late seventies and early eighties, will remember how persistently the counsel and high officers of these corporations argued and contended, to a greater or lesser extent, that Congress lacked the power, and that even conceding the power, yet that the matter of interstate railway transportation was of that unique and peculiarly delicate and sensitive character that legislative regulation in any form or degree however mild was fatal and destructive.

It was a most sensitive plant, that would utterly wilt under the mildest rays of the legislative sun. Natural laws, so it was said, would work out the whole problem, and natural laws in these cases generally meant watered stock, modified by pools, rebates, and discriminations, personal and local. It is said of Archimedes that he once exclaimed, "Give me a fulcrum for my lever and I will move the world." So the modern Fink or Blanchard a few years ago in substance exclaimed, "Give me the free and untrammeled use of pools and discriminations, local and personal, and I will anthracite-coal and standard-oil the entire country." But mark what an abatement in pretense there is. On January 5, 1887, the New York Times published a letter from the railroad magnate, Mr. Blanchard—he who ranks next to Mr. Fink as a railroad expert—wherein he attacks sections 4 and 5 of this bill—the long and short haul and the pooling sections. He commences his letter with the following pregnant and suggestive paragraph:

To the Editor of the New York Times:

Permit a response to your comment of the 28th of December touching long and short haul rates, as treated by the pending interstate-commerce bill, and some observations upon its other features. Conservative railway managers admit that it should prohibit discriminating preferences and unreasonable rates, and require publicity and adequate legal penalties. This entitles their grounds of dissent from its long and short haul and anti-pooling provisions to fair consideration.

Just note the admission: "Conservative railroad men admit"—admit what? Why, that everything in this bill is just and right, except sections 4 to 5. Compare this with the attitude of the railroads before the Committee of Commerce in this House in 1882—yes, 1882, no longer ago than that—and you will be astonished and forced to exclaim, "O Lord! how are the mighty fallen!" But by this admission we think, and shall attempt to show, that Mr. Blanchard practically and substantially concedes the justice of the entire bill.

The evils against which relief is sought may very properly be grouped under two heads, exorbitant rates and unjust discrimination. Too high rates or odious discrimination in some form are the evils against which we seek protection. All railroad maladministration, as practiced, and with which we are at all familiar, leads to one or the other of these results. We are oppressed, as individuals or as communities, because the rates are either too high or because they are unequal in some form or other, and our point objective in any remedial measure must necessarily be to secure cheapness and equality; and whatever tends—necessarily and controllingly tends—to produce exorbitant rates or unjust discrimination must be eradicated, curtailed, or checked in some form. This is the true logical and true legislative problem under all circumstances, and no sophistry should divert us from the true seat of danger.

Experience, as demonstrated by the live-stock pool in Chicago prior to 1880, the Standard Oil pool, the Anthracite Coal pool, the late pool of the Central Union and Southern Pacific Railways, and the present Colorado pool, all goes to show that there is no instrumentality so effective to keep up high and crushing discriminations, so as to be almost prohibitory in their character, as pools, whether of freight or earnings. As a sample of the Standard Oil pool and extortion, I beg leave to quote the following from the Drovers' Journal, of Chicago, of December 21, 1886:

SOMETHING ABOUT RAILROAD EXTORTION.

The Chicago Tribune, yesterday morning, in speaking of the interstate railroad law, gives the following illustrations, showing the relentless and unjust discriminations practiced against individual shippers in favor of monstrous monopolies: The Standard Oil Company demanded and received of the Cleveland and Marietta Railroad the following terms:

"The Standard Oil Company threatens to store and afterward pipe all oils under its control unless you make the following arrangement, namely: You shall make a uniform rate of 35 cents per barrel to all persons except the Standard Oil Company; you shall charge them 10 cents per barrel for their oil, and also pay them 25 cents per barrel out of the 35 cents collected of other shippers."

The manager of the road allowed the Standard Oil Company a rate more than 60 per cent. below the ordinary charge, and also paid it 70 per cent. of the amount collected from other shippers. What does the thinking public think of this?

The following letter was written to the Louisville and Nashville road by their local agent at Louisville, Ky.:

LOUISVILLE, KY.

DEAR SIR: Wilkinson & Co., Nashville, received car of oil Monday, 13th, seventy barrels, which we suspect, shipped through on the usual fifth-class rate—in fact, we might say we know it did—paying only $41.50 freight from here; charges, $57.40. Please turn on another screw.

Yours, truly,

CHESS CARLEY COMPANY.

J. M. CULP,
G. F. A., L. and N. Railroad Company.

The railroad officials complied with the demand, "turned on another screw," and on the next shipment made to Wilkinson & Co. the rate was $63.

Are outrages like these to continue unchecked? Is the business of the country to remain subject to blood-letting by pools whenever they desire, and ruin shippers and producers by extortionate freight rates?

On the 1st of last March the east-bound pool increased the freight on live-stock 40 per cent. and on dressed beef 50 per cent. from Chicago to the seaboard; and by this one act alone they have taken from the pockets of the producers of live-stock, not thousands, but millions of dollars, which has been divided between the six trunk lines comprising the east-bound pool.

No doubt the railroad managers and pool commissioners will claim that the rate made by the Standard Oil Company and the rebates paid them, also the extortionate freight rates on live stock and dressed beef, were all done for the interest of the public. No such outrages as those cited above could take place under the Cullom bill, and therefore it is entirely reasonable to suppose that the measure will be opposed with all the power of the Standard Oil Company, which has its agents not only in the Senate but in the Cabinet also.

It will also be bitterly opposed by the managers of the leading railroads and all pool commissioners with the hope of deceiving the public, only to retain their power and "turn on another screw" whenever ordered by the railroad magnates.

We earnestly hope that every honestly-disposed paper in the country, and especially those interested in the live-stock industry, will do everything in their power to further the passage of the Cullom interstate-commerce bill.

And the New York Times of this month, in speaking of the present Colorado prohibitive pool and of Mr. Adams's connection with it, uses this pregnant and suggestive language:

ONE EFFECT OF POOLING—CUT-THROAT POLICY OF THE UNION PACIFIC COMPANY.

While railroad managers are making protests against the features of the interstate-commerce bill which prohibit pooling and charging more for short than for long distances under like conditions, and getting the help of such commercial bodies as the New York Chamber of Commerce, it will be well not to overlook the existence of actual wrongs and abuses which these provisions are intended to remedy. The correspondence which we published yesterday between President Porter, of the North Chicago Rolling-Mills, and the officers of the Southwestern Railway Association and the Union Pacific Railway Company [copied from the Chicago Tribune] throws a strong light on certain railroad methods which certainly call for correction.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company has an agreement with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Denver and Rio Grande whereby a division of all Colorado business is made between the parties to the agreement, to the exclusion of other competing lines. One result of this agreement is the refusal of the Union Pacific to carry steel rails from Chicago to Colorado intended for the Colorado Midland, except at rates which are prohibitory. By putting rates at $16 per ton, when nearly half the distance—to Kansas City—they are only $3 a ton, the Union Pacific practically refuses a business which President Porter declares would amount to from $200,000 to $300,000, one-half profit. The purpose of the refusal is to prevent the building up of a rival to the Denver and Rio Grande road. An incidental effect is to interfere seriously with the legitimate business of the Chicago steel manufacturers and to hamper the development of the railroad interests of Colorado. It also results in throwing away profitable business which the Union Pacific might have at a time when it is pleading poverty as an excuse for having its obligations to the Government placed upon a more favorable basis. The treatment of President Porter's appeal for justice by President Charles Francis Adams is worthy of the worst days of the Union Pacific management under Jay Gould and Sidney Dillon.

A still more flagrant instance of the injustice wrought by the Colorado pool is set forth in the first annual report of the railroad commissioner of Colorado. From this it appears that in consequence of the tripartite agreement with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Denver and Rio Grande, the Union Pacific refused to interchange traffic with the Denver and New Orleans line under arrangements for through rates and a continuous shipment. At a time when the latter was prepared to guarantee from a single shipper business which would amount to a train-load of freight a day for months and lead to other profitable business, the Union Pacific obstinately refused to provide for it. It refused to furnish stock-cars at Pueblo for cattle to be carried over its own line when it was furnishing the Denver and Rio Grande all it wanted, and had others by the score lying idle on side tracks at Denver week after week. The interests of shippers at Pueblo and Colorado Springs were seriously injured, and the business of the whole region interfered with by unjust discrimination through an agreement which was not intended to maintain stable rates, but to prevent competition with a party to the pooling agreement. The appeal of the Colorado railroad commission to Mr. Charles Francis Adams was treated in the same cavalier manner as the more recent protest of Mr. Porter.

Mr. Adams, the president of the Union Pacific, seems to be a different man from Charles Francis Adams, jr., railroad commissioner of Massachusetts and writer on the abuses of railroad management of years ago. "I cannot understand," says Mr. Porter, "how a sincere and honest man could have written the articles Mr. Adams did and advocate the principles he did as a railroad commissioner of Massachusetts, and now make such communications as president of the railroad." Commissioner Felker, of Colorado, in writing to Mr. Adams, quoted to him his own language concerning pooling abuses used at Portland, Oreg., as follows: "The railroad management which undertakes in that way to hamper the natural freedom of trade is not minding its own business. Whether it is making a fortune or not, it does not deserve to make one." According to the representations of its president the Union Pacific is not now making a fortune, and according to the principles he formerly enunciated it does not deserve to make one. Its conduct in making discriminating rates, in refusing traffic, and in trying to crush competition in connecting lines should be taken into account when it claims to be treated with tenderness in its relations with the Government. The abuses in railroad management, of which such cases as those referred to above are samples, have also an important bearing on the protests against the interstate-commerce bill.

Is not all this ample evidence of the crushing effect of these pools? It is possible that, like some great poisons, under certain conditions these pools may do some good. But the power for goodness is so out of all proportion to the power for evil that salvation lies only in absolute prohibition. On the uppermost coast of Norway there is said to be an ocean whirlpool—called the Maelstrom—of such hideous character that it absorbs and forever swallows up all boats, vessels, or other craft that venture near its vortex. And so it seems that these railroad pools—railroad maelstroms, if you please—are of such malevolent nature as not only to crush out such shippers as Mr. Porter, and absolutely debar them from marketing their goods, but also to utterly strangle such great and good men as Mr. Adams—I mean strangle and obliterate all that anti-monopoly goodness that was considered as appertaining to him before he became president of the Union Pacific. His reply to Mr. Porter was but a polite way of saying, "What are you going to do about it, anyway?"

Professor Hadley, of Yale, in his work on Railroad Transportation, pages 74–76, says, in speaking of pools to prevent too low rates:

There is but one way to prevent these results. If competition is ruinous to all parties, all parties must stop competing. If it finds no natural limit it must be artificially limited; it must end in combination. And the moment you have established an effective combination you have introduced the principle of monopoly. You have determined prices, not in open market, but by an agreement among all the sellers.

This agreement may take any one of four forms: 1, agreement to maintain rates; 2, to divide the field; 3, to divide the traffic; 4, to divide the earnings. The last three are commonly known as pools.

The first is the simplest, but least effective. There is scarcely an organized industry where the dealers do not meet and settle upon a schedule of rates and discounts, agreeing that no one shall sell below these prices. Such agreements are rarely kept. It is for the interest of all that rates in general should be maintained, but it is for the interest of each concern to secure business for itself by not quite maintaining them. This constitutes a great temptation to depart from schedule prices; a temptation all the stronger because it is so easy to violate the general agreement indirectly, and so hard to detect any such violation. The result is apt to be a system of underhand competition, worse in many respects than the open competition which existed before there was any agreement at all.

This is why it is found necessary to divide the business among the different competitors by a pooling agreement. Such agreements are hard to arrange. There is almost always a dispute about their terms. But as long as they are in force it is hard to violate them without actual fraud, and it is comparatively easy to detect such violations and deal with them severely.

When it is possible to "divide the field" this course is usually the simplest. We see it illustrated where different gas or water companies parcel off the different districts of a city to one another, or where manufacturers in different cities agree to leave one another in undisturbed possession of the home market. We see it not infrequently in agreements between railroads. But in the majority of cases this arrangement is impracticable, and the rival concerns agree upon the proportion of business which each is to do. The companies in the anthracite-coal combination have arranged how much coal each company may mine. Factory combinations determine how much each concern may manufacture. Railroads agree just what percentage of competitive traffic each road shall carry.

When one railroad receives more than its agreed share of business, it is generally inconvenient to send the goods by a rival route, and easier to arrange matters by a money payment. This brings us to the fourth and closest form of combination, where there is a division of earnings. The machinery for securing this division may have any degree of organization up to the point of actual consolidation of the competing interests.

The dangers of a pool lie in the arbitrary power which it places in the hands of a few men to deal as they will with the business of the country. Even granting that the actual abuses of combination are less than those of competition, it seems like taking refuge from the excesses of democracy in an enlightened despotism. There is some slight truth in the analogy, but we are likely to carry it too far.

Our courts have always set their faces sternly against pools in whatsoever form.

Pooling is a violation of the common law, because it is a restraint upon the freedom of trade and a conspiracy against the public welfare. And this doctrine is maintained in the following American cases: 8 Mass., 223; 1 Pickering, 450; 35 Pickering, 188; 19 Pickering, 51; 35 Ohio State Reports, 672; 68 Pennsylvania State, 173; 5 Denio, 434; 4 Denio, 349.

Judge Gibson, in the case of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania against Carlisle (Brightly, 40), says:

"I take it that a combination is criminal whenever the act has a necessary tendency to prejudice the public or to oppress individuals by unjustly subjecting them to the power of confederates. 'The object of these combinations is to raise the rate of freight, and the means adopted is to suspend competition and place the traffic under the exclusive control of the combination.'"

So contracts to prevent competition, as for instance, not to extend a railroad to a given point to prevent its competing with another road, held void and against public policy. (R. R. Co. vs. R. R. Co., 3 Prob. N. Y., 411.)

The attorneys in this case were William Tracy on one side and W. M. Evarts on the other, and both conceded this point. Also State vs. R. R. Co., 29 Conn. 538, to the same effect.

The following is a recent and fresh sample of how our courts regard pools. I read from a clipping of one of our public journals of January 4, 1887, as follows:

POOLS TO ADVANCE THE PRICE OF LAND ARE UNLAWFUL CONSPIRACIES.

NEW YORK, January 3.

James R. Keene, N. G. Miller, and Washington Butcher's Sons, in December, 1880, formed a pool to advance the price of land, and employed E. A. Kent & Co., of this city, and Poole, Kent & Co., as brokers, for the purchase and sale of land. It is said that a small fortune was realized. The members of the pool charged that their brokers had defrauded them by making fictitious purchases and sales. Keene sued Kent and others in the supreme court to recover his share of the profits of the pool. They interposed in defense that the transactions were gambling, and that the law would not force them to account.

Judge Daniels, of the general term of the supreme court, has rendered his opinion in the matter, reversing the opinion of the court below directing the brokers to file a bill of particulars of the pool transactions. He holds that the defense interposed is valid, and that the law does not sanction the form of gambling. Combinations to keep articles of food or other necessaries off the market, with the view of getting a higher price for it, are unlawful conspiracies punishable as a crime. Where successfully carried out, the effect would be to impose an additional burden on the public. It is little less than respectable robbery unsanctioned by law. There are no legal means to force a division of the plunder. They cannot appeal to the courts.

The decision concludes by saying that Keene has no right to expect the court will interpose its authority in his behalf to enforce that well-known principle of honor upon which his alleged rights must be successfully dependent.

Not a single decision can be found to the contrary in this country. The nearest to it is an ex parte direction of Judge Deady in Oregon to the receiver of a railroad company, where the judge seemed to have forgotten for the time being his judicial functions and assumed the rôle of a railroad manager. The English cases are no authority as to what the common law is, for the reason that under their railroad laws pooling is, under certain circumstances, if consented to by the shareholders of the respective companies and approved by the board of trade (an incorporate body, the head of which is a member of the British cabinet or Government), permitted to a limited extent.

If pools are dangerous, and ought to be restrained, as a matter of public policy in respect to all these smaller classes of business, how much more important and vital is it not that this the root of so many evils be entirely checked and restrained in respect to this the greatest, most omnipresent, and most omnipotent of all employments. The right of pooling being destroyed, we know that one of the greatest weapons for extortion and discrimination is fully sheathed. The Colorado pool is a complete bar between Mr. Porter and his customers. Our aim should be to so legislate—and that the present bill does—that the erection of such pool-barriers can not be possible in the future. Mr. Blanchard says that railroads can not get along without the right to make such pools. Has it got to this pass, that carriers can not thrive, without the power to inflict discriminatory, extortionate, and prohibitory rates, as in the case of Mr. Porter.

Conservative railroad men agree, says Mr. Blanchard, "that discriminating preferences should be prohibited." So say we all. And in order to effectually prevent it, we forbid that which is most productive of such preferences—pooling.

The other feature of the bill which Mr. Blanchard attacks is the so-called long and short haul clause. And yet, bitterly as he opposes this section, by his own admission it rests on as strong foundation as the other features of the bill which he says conservative railroad men approve. Before proceeding to discuss this feature of the bill, I cannot help considering one of the so-called protests—evidently made to order—with which we have of late been so plentifully favored. I especially desire to refer to that of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, found in the RECORD of January 14, 1887, where it is dwelt upon with much favor and unction.

The committee of the New York Chamber of Commerce say:

Your committee are of opinion that (section 4) the prohibition to charge more for a shorter haul than a longer one is objectionable and certain to work against the public welfare. If enacted, it would do little good to any one. Local rates would not be thereby reduced, but "through traffic," which, on the average, furnishes not to exceed one-quarter of the revenues of the trunk lines, would be either refused, or raised to a standard of local rate—thus obstructing and materially decreasing the moving and exportation of cotton, grain, petroleum, and other products.

"Local rates would not be reduced thereby," "but through traffic * * * would be either refused or raised to a standard of local rates." "Local rates would not be reduced thereby." Wise men of Gotham, we thank you for the frank admission. But, then, this being true, why should "through traffic" be either refused or put up to local rates? Pray, why, except through innate, inborn railroad "cussedness," and as defiance to the legislative will?

There are, according to Professor Hadley (page 111), three forms of discriminations—between classes of business, localities, and individuals. And of all these the most dangerous, because the most far-reaching and business-destroying is discrimination between localities. Professor Hadley (pages 120, 121, 122) bears unwilling and unconscious testimony to this. Here is what he says:

A special contract, for instance, is given to millers at Niagara. It produces new business at that point. But if it discriminates unfairly against the millers at Rochester or Buffalo, the gain of business at one place is made up by a loss at the other. Not a direct loss, be it observed; the mills will not shut down; but the natural growth of business will be checked. The railroad manager sees the mill at Niagara with its new traffic; he does not see how he may have prevented the growth of the old traffic at Rochester.

On the other hand, the great majority of local and personal discriminations are in favor of the strong. As such they do great harm to the community by increasing inequalities of power; and in the end they are apt to do harm to the roads themselves. The Standard Oil Company was fostered by a system of special rates until it became strong enough to dictate its own terms.

This was an extreme case; but there is almost always a certain opposition between the present and future interests of a railroad. If a company's object simply is to make as good a dividend as possible for the current year, that object is best obtained by squeezing the local business, of which it is sure, and securing competitive business on almost any terms, however low. But for the permanent interests of the road this is bad policy. The local business may bear the squeezing for a year or two, but it will gradually die under the effects. Such a policy destroys a road's best customers and strengthens the hands of those who are in a position to dictate their own terms.

Again, on pages 20 and 21 of his work, the professor remarks:

Reference has already been made to the inequality of railroad rates. This inequality always operates in favor of large cities. The reduction in rates was made under the stress of competition. It was made first and fullest where competition was sharpest. Even in those countries in Europe where the State owned many of the railroads but feeble opposition was offered to this tendency during the years 1850–1872. In England and the United States it was pursued with utter recklessness.

The aggregation of business in cities of itself gives the large establishment an advantage over the small dealer. The latter has no longer a local custom of which he is sure. His personal attention to details begins to count for less. His competitor's large capital and wide connection count for more. Too often mere unscrupulousness in business may seem to count for most of all. The small capitalist and the independent workman are crushed out. The distinction of employers and employed becomes more sharply drawn. The workman can no longer confidently hope to become the employer of his own labor. It is these tendencies which give force to the agitation in favor of socialism. Unfortunately, the effect of the policy of most of our railroads is to intensify these tendencies. They do not merely favor cities; they favor individual producers. The largest or most unscrupulous concern gets the best rates. Differences are made which are sufficient to cripple all smaller competitors and sooner or later drive them to the wall, and concentrate industry in a few hands.

But where one set of men own a railroad and another set of men use it, the two only coming in contact through the medium of the railroad management, we have a state of things corresponding to the "absenteeism" of Irish landlords and involving conflicts or dangers of the same kind.

And again the professor, on page 138, adds:

If the object of a railroad manager is simply to pay as large a dividend as possible for the current year, he can best do it by squeezing his local traffic, of which he is sure, and securing through traffic at the expense of other roads by specially low rates—that is, by a policy of heavy discrimination. But the permanent effect of such a policy is to destroy the local trade, which gives a road its best and surest custom, and to build up a trade which can go by another route whenever it pleases. The permanent effect of such a policy is thus ruinous to the railroad as well as the local shipper.

Mark the language. "The permanent effect," mark you, "of such a policy"—that is, discrimination between localities—"is thus ruinous to the railroads as well as the local shipper." Here is a calm, "conservative" railroad authority—for manifestly he leans that way—as to the short-sightedness, deleterious and baleful effect, of local discriminations. Undue and unjust discriminations have always been frowned upon and held illegal by our courts, in whatsoever form manifested. Our courts have always aimed to uphold and enforce equality in rates and facilities. (Messenger vs. Railroad Company, 7 Vroom (N. J.), 407; Railroad Company vs. Railroad Company, 110 United States Supreme Court Rep., 667; Pierce on Railroads, 498; Hutchinson on Carriers, sections 297–303; McDuffie vs. Railroad Company, 52 N. H., 430.)

In the Messenger case the court says: "I am not able to see how it can be admissible for a common carrier to demand a different hire from various persons for an identical kind of service under indentical conditions. A person having a public duty to discharge is undoubtedly bound to exercise such office for the equal benefit of all, and, therefore, to permit the common carrier to charge various prices, according to the person with whom he deals, for the same services, is to forget that he owes a duty to the community." The very groundwork of the Munn case was clearly outlined in the Messenger case.

The bill in sections 2 and 3 prohibits unjust discriminations between individuals and classes of business. Mr. Blanchard says that conservative railroad men concede the justice of this prohibition. As a matter of law and ethics there can be no question of its justice. If it is our duty as legislators to protect individuals against unjust discriminations, surely it is much more our duty, as greater interests are involved, to protect our little communities against the rapacity of the large cities and large terminal points. Discriminations between individuals are unjust and illegal because they tend to crush out the weak and poor, the small shippers, and build up the rich and strong, the big shippers. So discriminations between localities, while it builds up large terminal points, utterly dries up and crushes out the numerous small intermediate points. The life blood of these smaller places is transfused by discriminating rates into the vitals of the large terminal points. My notion is, I am free to state, and I can see no other honest conclusion, that remedial legislation should be extended to protect the weak and helpless locality as well as the weak and helpless individual. We owe a duty to both, and it would be gross shortsightedness, nay more, it would be cowardly at this juncture to forego our duty to either.

In this connection, too, we must not lose sight of the fact that while the bill absolutely and totally prohibits unjust discriminations between individuals, it is only to a limited extent and in a qualified degree that discriminations between localities are prohibited; it must be as to the like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, over the same line, in the same direction, and where the shorter distance is included within the longer, that no more can be charged for a shorter than a longer haul, and even this limited inhibition the commission may, in its discretion, in particular instances, waive or modify, thus leaving the provision with ample elasticity.

When the railroads now contend that the right of unlimited local discrimination, as distinguished from personal discrimination, is essential, and a sine qua non to their well-being and existence, we have good ground to question and doubt the sincerity and truthfulness of such contention. For it is but a very short time ago that they made exactly the same claims as to the necessity and justice of personal discriminations. We were then gravely told that it was both just and necessary to discriminate in favor of the great shipper as against the smaller—railroads could not well exist or prosper without this privilege. But all this, Mr. Blanchard informs us, is now obsolete and a thing of the past. Not only is the power of unlimited local discrimination not necessary or essential to the railroads, but the free exercise of such power is in the long run detrimental and destructive to the best interests of the roads. Professor Hadley is clearly of this opinion, for he says, in speaking of such practice (page 138):

"But the permanent effect of such a policy is to destroy the local trade, which gives a road its best and surest custom, and to build up a trade which can go by another route whenever it pleases. The permanent effect of such a policy is ruinous to the railroad as well as the local shipper." This is the unbiased opinion and judgment of a great thinker and student on this subject—a gentleman who certainly can not be accused of unfairness or unfriendliness to the railroads. We have no fears that this trifling and limited protection which section 4 aims to throw around our small towns, cities, and villages will of itself occasion any increase of rates from the large terminal cities or large terminal points. These "competitive" places, under a law prohibiting pooling, will take care of themselves, and suffer no harm; and we believe, as Mr. Hadley suggests, that this bit of relief and justice given to the smaller towns will so stimulate the business at these non-competitive points that the slight reduction in rates will be more than made up by the increased volume of business, and that prosperity and commercial success will be more evenly distributed and diffused, and not confined, as now, to a very large extent, to the large terminal points.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is involved in this section 4 something still more important than anything I have so far suggested, or than any mere commercial considerations. The discriminations between localities as practiced by our great trunk lines builds up abnormally fast, at the expense of the small intermediate towns, a few large and immense terminal points; and it is in these great commercial centers where, along with their huge volumes of traffic and commerce, large masses of combustible human material are gathered together and stored. This human dynamite is attracted by and the product of the concentrative policy of the railroads; and we are already clearly admonished that the weak point in our social fabric is in these great human masses concentrated in our larger cities, and that if any harm happens to the Republic it will be found that the seat of danger and the stress and strain are in our New Yorks, Chicagos, and other great terminal points. Not that these poor, toiling human masses thus gathered together are to blame for all this. They are thus driven and huddled together by the stress of traffic, propelled by concentrated capital back of a locomotive engine.

The mainstay and balance-wheel of free institutions—the seat of a pure and honest ballot—is ever mainly to be sought among our smaller towns and rural communities. These, therefore, as a matter of sound State policy, it is folly and sheer wantonness to neglect or suffer to be overrun. We are convinced that, looking to the great future of our country—and our legislative vision surely ought to extend beyond the ruffled and fleeting present—that true wisdom and true statesmanship lie in diffusing rather than concentrating, territorially speaking, our labor, capital, manufactures, commerce, and traffic. The prosperity of all this multitude of small hamlets can alone render our country truly prosperous and progressive.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with oft-repeated pledges made to my constituents when they elected me to this and to the Fiftieth Congress, in obedience to the dictates of my conscience, and following my best judgment, I rise to oppose this measure.

For eight years—ever since I became acquainted with the provisions of what is so widely known as the Reagan bill, I have given it my unqualified support. I voted for its consideration in the Forty-sixth Congress. Under the leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] I voted with the majority of this House at the last session to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Cullom bill, and to substitute in its stead the Reagan bill. The motion was adopted, and I then voted for its passage. In common with my constituents, I considered the Reagan bill a wise and well-guarded measure for the regulation of commerce among the States. I considered it both safe and conservative, and free from dangerous experimental provisions.

But the bill now under consideration is in no sense the Reagan bill, nor does it bear the slightest resemblance to that measure. To prove this, I first quote from the conference report signed by Mr. REAGAN and the other managers on the part of both the House and the Senate:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1532) "to regulate commerce," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment, and agree to the bill of the Senate, with the following amendment thereto in the nature of a substitute, and that the Senate agree to the same:

In other words, the managers recommend that the House recede from the Reagan bill, which it has passed, and agree to substantially the Cullom bill, which it has heretofore refused to pass.

The author of the bill, Senator CULLOM, in closing the debate, said concerning the action of the Senate conferees:

We tried to do the best we could with the bill that the Senate passed during the last session, to keep the bill as near to what the Senate had it as we could do, and to arrive at an agreement between the House and the Senate conferees.

I submit that the majority of the assaults on the bill now under consideration have been against provisions that were in the bill when the Senate voted for it during the last session of Congress.

And I submit that the assaults made on the bill in this House to-day have been on sections which were in the Cullom bill when the House rejected it at the last session. Again, he declares that "the Senate conferees considered it their duty to cling as far as possible to every portion of the bill as it was passed by the Senate." The bill under consideration shows that they held their grip successfully. This will still more clearly appear as we proceed with a comparison of the two rival bills.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Whom are you quoting now?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am quoting from Mr. CULLOM.

The third section of the Reagan bill relates to rebates, and is as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid, directly or indirectly, to allow any rebate, drawback, or other advantage in any form upon shipments made or services rendered as aforesaid by him or them.

There the section stops, just as the commandment stops when it says "Thou shalt not steal." [Laughter.]

The language is plain and unequivocal. It carries with it no doubt, no uncertainty. But it was discarded by the conferees and the second section of the Cullom bill substituted in its place. It is as follows:

That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

It will be noticed that this is taken from the Cullom bill word for word. In the name of all the schoolmasters at once, I want to know what this section means. One thing is clear: it allows special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and other devices whereby a common carrier may receive from one person greater compensation for services rendered than it receives from other persons for like services, provided the service is not "contemporaneous" and "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." No provision of this character was ever inserted in the Reagan bill from the time it was first introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress down to the present hour. The language used in the Reagan bill is, as I have shown, an unequivocal prohibition; but this conference bill merely limits the right to give rebates, drawbacks, &c.; nothing more.

A common carrier may continue to grant special rates, rebates, drawbacks, &c., subject only to this limitation. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] yesterday asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to give him an illustration of how this provision would work. I will give the House an illustration: Here is a poor shipper who has annually four car-loads of freight to ship from a given point in the West to the city of Chicago. For that freight he is charged a certain rate. Here is another shipper, right along side of him, who, by reason of special favor, rebates, drawbacks, &c., received in the past, has become rich and is a cattle merchant, an extensive lumber dealer, and a grain merchant, and he ships, perhaps, 200 car-loads annually from the same point to the same market. The poor shipper is charged, we will say, $60 a car; the rich shipper, having fifty times the amount of business per annum, is charged the same rate per car, but is allowed a rebate of $20 per car. I want to know whether the granting of such a rebate would be a violation of this section?

Mr. CRISP. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me answer my own question first, and then I will hear your answer. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that that would not be a violation of this section, because the services rendered to these two shippers would not be likely to be rendered "contemporaneously" nor "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions." I say that is the meaning that will be given to this section. I yield now for the answer of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I only wish to say, in reply to the question of my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], that that section of the bill is intended to prohibit a rebate in just such cases as the one he has stated, and the terms employed in the section, "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," were put there in the interest of the people, so that the railroads might not say that because one shipper had two car-loads and the other had two hundred they should not be treated alike. The section provides that there shall be no discrimination in cases substantially alike.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is the gentleman's interpretation of it.

Mr. CRISP. It is the uniform interpretation of it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There was no such provision in the Reagan bill. It was in the Cullom bill, which the gentleman voted against at the last session of Congress, but it never was in the Reagan bill from the time it was first presented down to the present hour.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me to inquire——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Wait a minute. The gentleman says that provision was put in there to prevent such discriminations. If so, why was it not put into the Reagan bill at some time during the protracted controversy that has taken place during the past ten or fifteen years? If the gentleman is right it is a little strange that the distinguished gentleman from Texas never thought it was necessary during those long years. Why was it not put into the Reagan bill at the last session of Congress?

Mr. CRISP. One word, if the gentleman will allow me. The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] being absent, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] seeming to put great stress upon the name, "Reagan bill," I say to him on my authority, and I venture to say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will sustain me, that that gentleman did approve this language, and thought it was an improvement upon the section as he had it in his bill, in the interest of preventing discriminations. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It is a very strange thing, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Texas approved that section at the instance of the author of the Senate bill, and approved it in this conference committee, although he had never approved it before at any time in the long history of this controversy. How can it possibly be an improvement upon the corresponding section of the Reagan bill, which prohibits rebates under all circumstances?

I pass to the section of this bill which relates to "preferences and advantages." This third section of the pending bill is shrouded in the same mystery and uncertainty as the second section. It is taken bodily from the Cullom bill, and provides as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Does anybody know what is the meaning of this language, "undue or unreasonable?" I will tell you what it means. It means that the railroad companies are to be the judges of whether the preference or advantage is "undue or unreasonable." Where will the people be compelled to go to ascertain whether the construction of the railroad companies is right? Into the Federal courts, where business is three years behindhand, or before a commission sitting a thousand miles away from their homes. If they go into the Federal courts they must await the slow process of litigation in those tribunals, during which time the railroad companies will be allowed to put their own construction upon the meaning of that section. That is what it means.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman understands that a railroad company can not continue to do what it has been enjoined from doing.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I know that; but the party injured must go into a Federal court to enjoin the company.

Mr. CRISP. But he can obtain an injunction pending the suit; and while the injunction continues to operate the railroad company can not collect the tariff in question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Is it to be supposed that a poor man, such as I spoke of awhile ago, transporting only 4 car-loads or less per annum, and whose loss under the discrimination is only $80 or less, will go to a Federal court for an injunction or to litigate with these powerful corporations, who can transport their own witnesses without expense to them from one State or one part of the Union to another? The remedy suggested is without value.

Now, take the long and short haul clause, and let us see whether we have any of the Reagan bill in that. The following is section 4 of the Reagan bill, as it passed the House, in regard to long and short hauls; and the language is clear and unmistakable:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property, as provided in the first section of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same for a shorter than for a longer distance, which includes the shorter distance, on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

This is the whole of section 4 of the Reagan bill. Is there any doubt about what it means? Now, observe that the committee of conference have abandoned this fourth section as they have the other section of the Reagan bill to which I alluded, and have adopted the fourth section of the Cullom bill:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Now, this is substantially the Cullom bill, the only difference being that the commission, while prohibited from making general rules for the exemption of common carriers in special cases, are clothed with the dangerous power of prescribing the extent to which the common carrier may be relieved, which means practically the same thing. And their action is final; there is no appeal from it to any court. Can all the lawyers in Philadelphia combined tell me what is meant by "in the aggregate," or "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," in this section?

Why, the Senate conferees disagree. So do the House conferees. They each disagree among themselves. The Senate disagrees and the House disagrees. And can it be supposed that the five commissioners appointed under the provisions of this act will agree? Is it not to be presumed that they will disagree also as to the meaning of the section?

One other word. The act of the commission is final; and it is an ex parte hearing. It is done on application of the railroad company, and there is no provision whatever in the section for the apperance of anybody in behalf of the people. It is purely and simply a provision for the railroad companies to the exclusion of the interests and rights of the people.

Gentlemen may say the commissioners will gladly hear persons representing localities. How may we know in the long years during which this commission will exist, in all probability, there will not come a time when the right of the people to be heard will be denied by this commission, or when this commission may hear in a star-chamber the application of a railroad company to be exempted from the fourth section of the bill.

I protest against it, Mr. Speaker, in the name of the people who have the right to have ample provision for their appearance and for their right to be heard in a tribunal which is to pass upon their rights.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Suppose they were disposed to hear these complaints, at what time might an applicant hope to be heard in view of the number of questions which would arise, what time in the century? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is only a repetition of the question that John asked on the Island of Patmos, How long, O Lord, how long? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, how long? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Never.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So I think.

Mr. CRISP. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Suppose the gentleman from Iowa was charged with the investigation of a particular question, would he or would he not give both sides an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is not any doubt about that, but I shall not be on the commission. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I am glad we have material, then, out of which to make an honest commission.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us come to the clause of the Reagan bill prohibiting combinations for pooling. It is as follows:

It shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for pooling of freights, or pooling freights of different or competing railroads by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of such railroads or any portion of them, and in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights or earnings as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

It will be observed the freight pools were alone referred to in the Reagan bill, but the Reagan bill only relates to the freight traffic, and this is in harmony with the other provisions of that bill. But the bill now under consideration undertakes to deal with freight and passenger traffic, and why should it stop with a proposition for freight pools and leave the passenger pool undisturbed. There can be no question this is the plain meaning of section 5, and I will quote the exact language. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any other common carrier or carriers for the pooling of freights of different and competing railroads, or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion thereof; and in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

Now in construing that section, and I doubt whether there is any one on this floor who will differ with me, pooling of freight and freight earnings is alone prohibited. Does the gentleman from Georgia take issue with me on that point?

Mr. CRISP. He does.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. In what respect?

Mr. CRISP. I can give you the reason for the transposition of those words.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. CRISP. The Reagan bill prohibited the pooling of freights. That was the language of the bill. It was conceived that that might relate to pools, some of which exist in the United States, by which railroads agree what proportion of freight each one will carry. The other provision was put in to reach the other character of pool, which is not a pooling of freights, but a pooling of the earnings of the road. In the case of pooling freights of course it can apply only to the transportation of freights, while in the case of pooling the aggregate receipts of the roads it applies to the receipts from all sources.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Now the gentleman from Georgia avoids Scylla but strikes Charybdis. He jumps from one difficulty into another if he takes that position. It will not be claimed that the Reagan bill prohibited pooling of anything but freights and freight earnings.

Mr. CRISP. Not freight rates.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Well, freights. But I will read the language of the bill itself, so that there can be no question about it:

Or to pool the freights of different and competing railroads by dividing between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads or any portion of them. And in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights or earnings, as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

The gentleman will not claim, then, that the Reagan bill prohibited passenger pools. It clearly did not relate to passenger traffic in any sense whatever.

Mr. CRISP. It did not.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It did not, as is admitted now by the gentleman from Georgia himself.

Now you have copied almost exactly the language of the fifth section of the Reagan bill. You have not changed its meaning at all; and one thing is certain, that the penalty prescribed here:

And in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights or earnings, as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

In no event could a passenger pool be guilty of a separate offense for each day under the plain language of this section.

Mr. CRISP. I know the gentleman from Iowa wants to be entirely frank.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Of course.

Mr. CRISP. I must have been unfortunate in my explanation of the bill. The Reagan bill provided that it should be illegal for the carrier to pool—have you got the language there of the bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have.

Mr. CRISP. Will you be kind enough to read that provision?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

It shall be unlawful for any person or persons carrying property as aforesaid to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination for the pooling of freights, or to pool the freights of different and competing railroads, by dividing, &c.

Mr. CRISP. "By dividing;" and I ask the attention of the House to this, for that is a clear distinction. It provided that it should be unlawful to pool freights of competing roads, by dividing the aggregate of the net proceeds of the earnings of the roads.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. Now, there are pools in the country, as I said a moment ago, that do not relate to money received for the transportation of freight, but which relate to the freight itself. Railroads agree that a certain road shall carry so much of the freight, another so much, and so on, but this is a pool of the freight itself. The language of the Reagan bill we thought was improved when we said we prohibited that, and also the division of money arising from freights.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is entirely another interpretation of a doubtful section. But one thing is certain, that the penalty prescribed by this section making each day of its continuance a separate offense would not apply. The maximum fine of $5,000 would alone apply. If they pool the earnings, it will be but one offense, if it continues for a year. If they pool passenger rates or earnings even under the gentleman's construction, it is only one offense, for which $5,000 is the maximum fine, although the pool may continue throughout the year. It is a mere bagatelle, not sufficient to deter the railroads from entering into a passenger pool, or sufficient to deter them from pooling their earnings from that source where they perhaps make millions of dollars each out of the pool. It might be only the minimum penalty of $1. Is that, I ask, sufficient to deter the railroads from pooling or from going into a passenger pool? Certainly not.

Mr. CRISP. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Well, what is it then?

Mr. CRISP. The provision to which you refer makes each day a separate offense.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, sir; in the Reagan bill.

Mr. CRISP. That clause is not the clause under which the railroad would be punished for a violation of this law. The punitory provision says that for the commission of every act declared by this act to be unlawful the officers shall be punished by a fine.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. By a fine of $5,000. Now suppose they make a pool that lasts twelve months, of the passenger earnings or the freight earnings, what is the penalty under your bill?

Mr. CRISP. Why, undoubtedly the penalty would be the $5,000 fine put upon the corporation, and every day would be a separate offense.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. If it were the pooling of freights.

Mr. CRISP. It would, in my humble judgment, if it were the pooling of passenger fares. But did the gentleman ever know of a passenger pool?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly. I am astonished at the question. There have been such pools all over the country. They were referred to in the debates in the Senate. They exist. There are passenger pools all over the country. And there are instances where railroads have cut passenger rates to one dollar and kept it up for months to force their way into a passenger pool, and they had to be received into that passenger pool in order to save the other roads and restore the old rates.

Here you have another section which is doubtful.

Now, these are the controlling provisions of this bill except the provisions which relate to the commission and that portion which relates to the courts that shall have jurisdiction to hear complaints under this act. Neither the commission clause nor the court clause that you have in this bill were in the Reagan bill. Neither were your rebate section, your preference section, your long and short haul section—none of those were in the Reagan bill, and they are the controlling and important sections of the bill.

It seems to be the theory of the pending bill to do as little for the people as possible; and in making that remark I wish to say I am entirely impersonal in everything I say here, and desire to be so. It seems to be the theory of the pending bill, I repeat, to do as little for the people as possible and to render those sections of the bill relating to the rights of the people as obscure and unintelligible as human ingenuity can make them. To use the language of a distinguished member of this House, "If the hand of a Talleyrand was not present in the construction of this bill then all appearances are deceptive."

Suppose the great Lawgiver had constructed the Ten Commandments with the same uncertainty. Suppose he had said: "Thou shalt not steal; thou shalt not bear false witness; thou shalt not covet—contemporaneously or under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" [laughter]; or suppose, at the conclusion of the decalogue the following provision had been added: "Provided, however, that upon application to the high priest or ecclesiastical commissioner appointed under the provisions of this act persons so designated may be authorized to cheat, steal, bear false witness, or covet, and said commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which said persons may be relieved from any or all of said commandments." Under such circumstances would not the world have been without moral law from Moses to CULLOM and from Mount Sinai to Pike's Peak? [Great laughter.]

A distinguished gentleman [Senator FRYE] discussing this bill said, in another place:

> I should like to know what the fourth section means from this discussion. I should like to know how I or my constituents are to determine what it means from this discussion. I should like to know what lights have been thrown upon it. The conferees disagree in relation to it; almost every Senator who has discussed it disagrees with the other Senators in relation to it. Boards of trade in Boston and Indianapolis, the Chamber of Commerce in New York, Legislatures of the different States; all absolutely disagree diametrically as to what this fourth section is.

And another Senator, in another place not mentionable here, characterized the bill as follows:

> But there are matters in which, in my opinion, the bill is even more fatally defective, if that were possible, than in the particulars to which attention has been called. I regret that I have to vote for it, and I think there are a great many others in the same condition. This is a bill which practically nobody wants and which everybody intends to vote for, a bill which nobody is satisfied with and which everybody intends to accept, a bill which nobody knows what it means and yet we have all agreed it ought to pass.

But the distinguished gentleman is too broad and sweeping when he says the bill is in the condition he describes. It is only those portions of the measure which refer to the rights of the people which are obscure and shrouded in mystery. The things which are certain in this bill are precisely the things which the people do not want, and the things which are uncertain are precisely those about which the people demand the greatest possible certainty. All the safeguards thrown around the corporations are plain and unmistakable. There is no uncertainty whatever here. We will examine them in their order.

THREE THINGS THAT ARE CERTAIN.

The commission clause is certain. Does this House know that perforce of the very provision creating this commission it is provided that the terms of four of the commissioners will expire during the next Presidential term? The commissioners hold their office for two, three, four, five, six years from the 1st of January, 1887.

And only one of the five appointed can be reappointed by the present administration; four out of five of the commissioners must be appointed by the next incumbent of the Presidential office.

Mr. STEELE. Do you object to that because we are going to have a Republican? [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. This is to be a political board, and it is expressly made so by section 11, which provides that not more than three of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. Why is that provision in the bill? Why is politics expressly legislated into this bill?

Mr. ROWELL. Does not that give permission to appoint men who do not belong to either party?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Oh, yes; but does anybody believe they will do it?

The construction which these men place upon the law will be of the highest possible political consequence, and does anybody doubt that, if the next President of the United States should be a Republican, and having the appointment of the new members of the commission, that three of the members appointed by the present administration will go out, and three Republicans be placed on the board? I say that the functions of this board will make their decisions of the highest political significance, and unless the commissioners are stronger than human nature has generally been found to be when tempted, they will have the strongest possible temptation to make their decisions such as to gain the greatest amount of political power. Have we not seen that manifested upon the highest bench in the world? Have we not seen it in the subordinate courts of the country, political bias everywhere? Why, it is foolish to suppose that these men will be above political bias, political preference, and political leanings.

Another point with regard to this commission. It will be absolutely impotent to do anything for the people. Why, my colleagues, we have in this country 135,000 miles of railway, rapidly increasing, existing in thirty-eight States and nine Territories, with depots every 6 or 8 miles along the whole 135,000 miles, doing business every hour of every day with sixty millions of people; how will it be possible for a little court of five men, holding their sessions here in Washington, 1,200 miles away from my constituents and much farther from those who live nearer the setting sun—how will it be possible, I ask, for such a little court to determine the matters in controversy arising between sixty millions of people and this vast net-work of corporations covering the whole country? They can not do it. It is impossible. Five commissioners can not properly attend to the business of any one of the great trunk lines of this country, much less to all the interstate commerce of America. It is utterly impossible.

Why, sir, we have in this country in every State circuit courts and district courts, mayors of cities, superior courts, two justices of the peace in every township, circuit courts of the United States, district courts of the United States, supreme courts of the States and of the nation, and yet so great is the business arising from the multiplied transactions of our sixty millions of people that delay, delay, delay, is the rule now, even with all these courts constantly in operation throughout all the States and Territories. Yet you are going to relegate those sixty millions of people to one little court of five men, holding its sessions here at the capital of the nation, the most inconvenient point that could possibly be designated. This commission, sir, is useless, if it is not vicious.

Again, by the fourth section of the bill the commission are given power to suspend the operation of the law, and their action is final. This bill undertakes in the fourth section to prohibit certain things being done; in another section it prescribes a penalty of $5,000 for the violation of that provision; and then in the last part of the fourth section it authorizes these five men, who are not responsible to anybody on earth, to take final action, suspending both the prohibition and the penal sections of the act.

I come now to another important feature of the bill, the exclusive jurisdiction which it gives to the Federal courts to hear causes arising under the provisions of the act. Why not the State courts? We have the power, and I appeal to Democratic members of this House, is it according to the traditions of your party, is it Democratic, to build up the jurisdiction and the power of the Federal courts of this country? Is it not Democratic rather to open the State courts and keep them open—those courts created by the people for their own protection—is it not Democratic to enlarge their powers rather than to increase the powers of the Federal courts? I have said that we have the power to confer jurisdiction on the State courts. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] yesterday said that, "waiving the question" as to the power of the Government to confer jurisdiction on State courts, he had simply this to say, that if the House conferees had insisted upon retaining the State-court clause of the Reagan bill, we would have had no bill to pass this session. Aye, aye, a clear confession of surrender on the part of the conferees of this House to the clamor of the Senate conferees and to the theory contained in the Senate bill. It can be nothing else.

Mr. CRISP. Did the gentleman hope or expect that all the surrendering was to be done on the part of the Senate and none on the part of the House?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not at all. In matters involving no great question of principle, in matters of trivial importance, I would expect the conferees of the House to be conciliatory and yielding; but in matters that are fundamental, matters that go to the very marrow of this question, I for one did expect, and my constituents expected, and this country expected, that the House conferees would stand like a wall of iron and a tower of adamant against the encroachments of the corporate influences of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman will allow me, I think that the corporate influences of this country were very much in hope that the conference would result in just such a failure as the gentleman says he expected.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not at all, Mr. Speaker. No railroad man has ever risen, no man who is suspected of being in the interest of the railroads has ever risen in the discussion of this compromise bill, either in the Senate or in this House, to denounce the features of the bill that I am denouncing here now. It is true these railroad men have clamored against this bill, but they have clamored against the provisions which were in the Cullom bill when it passed the Senate, and we have repeatedly declared that to be a railroad bill. They have also clamored for the very provisions which the people from the start have said ought never to be incorporated in any interstate-commerce bill. No railroad man has ever objected to the commission; no railroad man has ever objected to the Federal court clause; no railroad man has ever objected to the power on the part of the commission to suspend the operation of the fourth section of this bill. They have at all times insisted that these sections should go into the bill if any bill was to pass.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether he was satisfied with the provision of the Reagan bill with reference to court jurisdiction?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Not entirely. I thought the jurisdiction ought to be exclusively in the State courts. But the Reagan bill did clothe the State courts with jurisdiction of the questions arising under it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether he is in favor of the long and short haul provision?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes, of the Reagan bill, but I am now discussing another provision, and I prefer not to be diverted from my line of argument.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman leaves this point will he allow me to call his attention to the exact language of the Reagan bill on this subject?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. (Reading)—

Which attorney's fee shall be taxed and collected as costs in the case, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does that language confer jurisdiction, or does it simply permit suit to be brought where jurisdiction now exists?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Oh, it was intended to confer jurisdiction as to damages as well as to costs, and that is what it did. I was discussing the power of Congress to confer jurisdiction on the State courts. Upon this point I desire to quote from 24 Howard, 108. I shall read very briefly from the language of Chief-Justice Taney in that case:

It is true that in the early days of the Government, Congress relied with confidence upon the co-operation and support of the States when exercising the legitimate powers of the General Government, and were accustomed to receive it upon principles of comity, and from a sense of mutual and common interest, where no such duty was imposed by the Constitution. And laws were passed authorizing State courts to entertain jurisdiction in proceedings by the United States to recover penalties and forfeitures incurred by breaches of their revenue laws and giving to the State courts the same authority with the district court of the United States to enforce such penalties and forfeitures, and also the power to hear the allegations of parties and to take proofs if an application for a remission of the penalty or forfeiture should be made according to the provisions of the acts of Congress.

Mr. BRUMM. That is not exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. BRUMM. Has the gentleman any authority on the point of giving the State courts exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir; that question is not involved here. Now, I wish to read from the decision of the Supreme Court delivered by Mr. Justice Field in the case of the United States vs. Jones, United States Reports 109, page 519:

Whether the tribunal shall be created directly by an act of Congress, or one already established by the States shall be adopted for the occasion, is a mere matter of legislative discretion.

Thus it is clearly established that it is a "mere matter of legislative discretion" whether we shall create a tribunal to carry out the provisions of an act of Congress, or whether we shall confer authority upon State tribunals to do it. Pursuing this same subject Justice Field on page 520 uses this language:

At different times various duties have been imposed by acts of Congress upon State tribunals; they have been invested with jurisdiction in civil suits and over complaints and prosecutions for fines, penalties, and forfeitures arising under laws of the United States.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to a passage from the decision in 24 Howard to which he has already referred?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP (reading).

And in these cases the co-operation of the States was a matter of comity, which the several sovereignties extended to one another for their mutual benefit. It was not regarded by either party as an obligation imposed by the Constitution. And the acts of Congress conferring the jurisdiction merely give the power to the State tribunals, but do not purport to regard it as a duty, and they leave it to the States to exercise it or not, as might best comport with their own sense of justice, and their own interest and convenience.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Undoubtedly that is correct.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman will allow me to say that this was a case where the State authority was required to do a certain thing; and the Supreme Court held it had not the right to do it under the circumstances.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I know what that case is; I think the gentleman is not familiar with it.

Mr. CRISP. Here it is in this volume; it speaks for itself.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will state that case. It is the case of the Commonwealth of Kentucky vs. Governor Dennison, of Ohio. There was a mandamus proceeding commenced to compel Governor Dennison to surrender a fugitive from justice from the State of Kentucky. The act of 1793 provided that when the requisition was made, it should be the duty of the governor to surrender the fugitive. The Supreme Court held that the State officer could not be compelled in that way. Now, of course, I do not take the position that we can compel a State court or any State officer to discharge a duty under United States law. The court, in the very language which I have read, declared that the action of the State authorities in such cases is a matter of comity. But does anybody suppose for a moment that the State courts would refuse to exercise jurisdiction under a law to prohibit wrongful discriminations on the part of railroad companies?

Those decisions go on to say the State Legislatures may give consent—that is, that they may pass an act consenting to give jurisdiction to the State courts under the Federal law. That would make their jurisdiction complete, and, furthermore, make it compulsory on the part of State courts to entertain that jurisdiction. There is no fear in that regard, for they will be responsible to the people for the manner in which they exercise their authority; but when you come to the Federal court you have no such safeguard thrown around that tribunal.

Mr. OATES. That question first came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Prigg against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in 16 Peters, and ever since then it has been settled and accepted by all the State tribunals whose decisions I have ever seen. That statute conferring jurisdiction on State courts did not oblige them to exercise it, but they could exercise it if they saw proper unless prohibited by some State statute.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Yes; a State could accept the burden.

Mr. OATES. They can accept it unless there is a prohibitory State statute.

Mr. CRISP. There is no issue on that point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I should like to go on for twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman continuing his remarks beyond the hour?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I do not desire to detain the House much longer. But, Mr. Speaker, it is conceded here that there is power on the part of the Government to confer jurisdiction on the State courts.

Mr. CRISP. Let me call the gentleman's attention to another fact, and I will not interrupt him again. I thank him for his courtesy in yielding to me.

If any remedy exists in State courts, it exists at common law, does it not?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. For any violation of the common-law rule—we concede most of these provisions are the same as the common-law rule—this act provides that nothing therein shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or the statutes, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But it is well known to every member of the House and to the gentleman, as well as to any other member, that all the practices we are now seeking to prohibit by this act have grown up under the common law. The remedies provided at common law were not sufficient. Has it not been recently decided in matters of interstate commerce the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction? That is my understanding; that it has been decided in two cases the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction in regard to interstate commerce. This act should relax that rule and confer jurisdiction upon the State courts. The people have asked for bread, and you give them a stone. They have asked for fish, and you give them a serpent.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask my colleague a question. Does not he know if the vote which he intends to give should be followed by the majority of this House and this bill be defeated it would be gratifying to all the railroad interests of this country from ocean to ocean and lake to gulf?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me finish my question. Does he not know that this city has been swarming with agents of railroad corporate power in order to defeat this bill as it has been reported by the conferees?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do not take up my time. They, of course, do not want any bill to pass; but if one must pass they want, in my opinion, just such provisions as are in this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But do you not know that the people of Iowa, whom you and I in part represent, are appealing for the passage of this bill into a law, so that the railroads may enter under the control of the national power?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I know that the people of Iowa want no such bill. I know my constituents, and, so far as I am able to ascertain the public sentiment in Iowa, it is diametrically opposed to any such bill. They want the Reagan bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Does the gentleman desire to be understood that he prefers no legislation at all on this subject than to have this bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I am going to vote against the passage of this bill. I do not propose to criticise or find fault with it, and then, demagogue like, go and vote for it, and I ask the gentleman from Iowa (my colleague) to answer me yes or no, is he satisfied with the provisions of this bill—yes or no?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will say Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Give me a categorical answer; yes or no.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me proceed a moment and answer in my own way. I say I thank my God that I have an opportunity to vote for a bill that lays the strong hand of the General Government upon the railroads of this country.

Do you vote against the passage of this bill because it does not satisfy you in every provision?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir; but when there is no important feature in it to which I can give my assent I must vote against it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Ah, we have then your estimate of the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa this question: Does it necessarily follow because we vote against the passage of this bill, that our vote is to be taken as an indication that we favor no legislation on this subject?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. No, sir; not by any means. When a man opposes the bill it does not therefore follow that he opposes legislation against the railroads, and no fair-minded man would say or think so. It is our right and duty to criticise such measures. That is what we are sent here for; and if they are inconsistent with our ideas of what is right to vote against them.

Mr. Speaker, having the power to confer jurisdiction either upon the State courts or upon the Federal courts, we deliberately refuse to exercise that power as to the State courts and force the people to go into courts where, as is publicly known, the railroads are all powerful, and where the corporations control, or are likely to control, the machinery of the courts, and where adjudications are longest delayed.

What is this but legislation in the interest of the powerful and the opulent? What is this but an attempt to make the way for the people dark, difficult, and thorny? How dare we refuse to prepare the way of the people to enter the courts which they have created for their own safety and protection? Dare we say to our constituents that neither they nor their State courts can be trusted to deal fairly with the railroads? Certainly not.

Now, one word as to the political features of this bill. I have already shown that the commission must be reconstituted during the next Presidential administration, and I have taken the pains to run over the register of the Department of Justice, and I find that five out of the nine supreme judges have passed three score and ten, and during the next Presidential term will, in all probability, in the course of human affairs have to be replaced. I have also found that out of the circuit and district judges of the United States a score of these Federal judges will also have to be replaced during the next Presidential administration.

What a powerful temptation to the railroad interests of this country to take part in your Presidential election, to set up the primaries, control your conventions, furnish the money to carry on your Presidential campaign, for the great prize of the commission that must construe this law, and the Supreme Court of the United States that must finally construe it, and the intermediary circuit and district courts that must construe it before it reaches the Supreme Court. It ought to be entitled a bill to more completely give over the control of the business and political interests of the people into the hands of the confederated monopolies.

Democrats, I adjure you to take heed to what I am saying. Is that the kind of a bill you want to pass—a bill that will enthrone the corporations in the politics of the country—that will make them all directly interested in every Presidential election?

Where did this movement originate but with the Democratic party? The author of the Reagan bill has been the champion of this controversy with the railroads for more than ten years; and the Democratic party, the Nationals, and the Anti-Monopolists have stood behind him, while the Senate has stood like a wall of iron against the passage of that measure. Finally, seeing they had to let us have something, they licked their bill into a shape satisfactory to themselves, but most dangerous to the people.

I appeal to the Democrats here to-day, and to all fair-minded men, whether Democrats or not, do they want that kind of a measure? Can any man shut his eyes to the fact that these railroad corporations have for the past decade exercised a powerful control in the politics of this nation? Does any man deny that? And will they not have an additional reason for interposing and intermeddling in the politics of this country if this bill passes?

Now, with a determination to do my duty conscientiously, I say that I shall oppose this bill not only with my voice but with my vote, acting in obedience to the express and oft-repeated pledges which I made to my constituency.

Mr. CALDWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock, the evening session to be for debate on this bill only.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is it understood, then, that my friend from Georgia will press the demand for the previous question in the morning? The House is very thin now. Gentlemen who had expected to take part in the discussion are not here. If the suggestion had been made earlier in the day it might have met with a favorable response; but I do not want that the discussion shall take place to empty seats, and that after discussion of that kind the previous question shall be ordered.

The House, as my friend will observe, is very thin. This is an important question; a more important question has not been presented to this House, as he will admit. It seems to me, therefore, that a little time may properly be taken in discussing it; and, for one, I hope that, whatever may be done touching this evening session, my friend will not insist upon the previous question in the morning.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his request for a moment in order that I may offer, for reference, a resolution asking certain information in regard to indebtedness of the Pacific railroads.

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives as soon as practicable, the sums of money which were owing to the United States on the 1st day of January, 1887, giving the sums which are due, principal and interest, under existing law, severally and collectively, from said companies, and what will be the result to the Treasury and the effect upon these debts if House bill No. 8313 should become a law and its provisions be complied with.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2589) and put it upon its passage. It is a measure which will not provoke any discussion at all. A bill authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the controversy which has heretofore existed in regard to this bill has been harmonized and the bill has been amended so as to be satisfactory to all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In other words, I understand that the bridge is going to be built in accordance with the requirements of existing law.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Yes, sir; it is all right. Everybody is agreed on it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are its provisions satisfactory in regard to the powers of the Secretary of War?

Mr. CLARDY and Mr. O'NEILL. Yes; that is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is the reading of the bill demanded?

Mr. CLARDY. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARDY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELENOR C. RANSOM.

Mr. MARKHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10795) granting a pension to Mrs. Elenor C. Ransom; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I simply desire to say that if the session this evening is desired merely for rhetorical exercises it is of no consequence whether it is held to-night or to-morrow; but if the evening session is to be held with the view of discussing the merits of this bill and affecting one way or the other the question of its passage, then I think the discussion ought to be had with a full House.

Mr. CRISP. My only purpose in making the request was to give an opportunity to gentlemen who desire to submit remarks upon this bill to do so. Two days have already been occupied in its consideration. I gave notice this morning that I hoped, with the consent of the House, to call the previous question upon it early to-morrow. Some gentlemen who wish to submit remarks upon it have not had an opportunity to do so. I regret that, and I made my suggestion in order that they might have such an opportunity, if they desired it. If there is objection——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not urge any objection, Mr. Speaker, only I desire to say to my friend that I do not think this evening session ought to be suggested to-morrow as a reason for insisting upon an early vote upon the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It will be, though.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman consent that debate at this evening session shall be limited to those who have written speeches to deliver?

Mr. CRISP. It is a matter of taste how gentlemen shall present their views, or when, if they can get the floor.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CRISP. I hope that will not be done, for this reason: I asked the Speaker to recognize me so that I might have control of the floor to-morrow to carry out the purpose I have already announced. The understanding between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] and myself when he was recognized was that if the House declined to order the evening session, he was to go on this afternoon. Therefore, I hope the House will not now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] insist upon the motion to adjourn?

Mr. DIBBLE. I do.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 28, noes 31.

Mr. CRISP. Now I renew my request——

Mr. STEELE. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were not ordered, only 11 voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. CRISP. I now renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, the evening session to be devoted to debate on this report, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. REED. With the understanding that this is not to be urged to-morrow as a reason for closing the debate at that time. The gentleman from Georgia will accept that qualification, of course.

Mr. CRISP. I have already given notice to-day that I hoped, with the consent of the House, to call the previous question to-morrow morning.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will accept this qualification. I think we can then agree to his proposition and go about our business.

Mr. CRISP. The trouble about the disclaimer which the gentleman desires me to make——

Mr. REED. Let it be understood that you do not disclaim anything; that none of us disclaims anything, and that the question of closing debate to-morrow is to remain untouched by any action we may now take.

Mr. CRISP. Then the understanding would be that we stand to-morrow exactly as we would have stood if we had not had a session to-night.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I agree to that.

Mr. DIBBLE. I object.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What would be the precise object of five or six persons coming here to-night to hear each other speak?

The SPEAKER. That matter is not before the House. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] has objected.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CRISP. I ask the House to indulge me a moment. Perhaps members fail to understand the situation here—fail to understand that by an arrangement intended in good faith and with their distinct assent to give gentlemen an opportunity to go on to-night, I have lost the right to obtain the floor to-morrow morning when this bill is called up. The understanding was that if the House objected to a recess, they would go on now and exhaust the hour. I only ask the House to require those gentlemen to do what in good faith they should do in carrying out that agreement.

Mr. STEELE. It is now past the usual time for adjourning.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have been constantly ready to go on.

Mr. DIBBLE. I have examined the roll of those who expect to be recognized to engage in this debate, and I think it will not take very long to-morrow to finish it. The motion I make is not designed to delay the decision of this question; but several of us wish to be heard on the subject, and we do not desire to speak to empty benches to-night. That is the reason I am pressing the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. DIBBLE that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 32, noes 33.

Mr. CRISP. I now move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, for debate only on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, with the understanding—which is no part of the motion, except by unanimous consent——

Mr. BURROWS. Will not the gentleman modify his motion by leaving off the latter clause? Let us simply take a recess until half past 7 o'clock, so as not to drive everybody away this evening.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. This being a privileged matter, the gentleman from Georgia has a right to call it up at any time, to the exclusion of other business. The gentleman moves that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 41, noes 14.

Mr. DIBBLE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. I do not wish to weary the patience of the House by trying to do what does not seem to be in accord with the general wish. I therefore withdraw the motion for a recess, and move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 20, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WILLIAM DICKENS—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill 2269, entitled "An act granting a pension to William Dickens."

The beneficiary named in this bill filed his application for pension in the Pension Bureau in 1880, and in December, 1886, the same was granted, taking effect from the 15th day of October, 1864.

If the bill herewith returned should become a law, it would permit the payment of a pension only from the date of its approval. Thus if it did not result in loss to the claimant by superseding the action of the Pension Bureau, it is plain that it would be a useless enactment.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 19, 1887.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State relative to an application for the relief of the widow of Moses A. Hopkins, late United States minister to Liberia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 19, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Department has been credibly advised of the reduced financial condition of Mrs. Hopkins, widow of Moses A. Hopkins, lately minister resident and consul-general of the United States to Liberia, and asked to take such action as may be consistent with former precedents in such cases to relieve Mrs. Hopkins.

There is no provision of law which enables this Department to relieve Mrs. Hopkins in any amount except by the payment of that which she may legally claim on account of salary due at the date of her husband's death upon filing the necessary papers of administration and her "widow's allowance" to enable her to return to her home. But, in view of the past action of Congress in giving the widows of diplomatic officers who die abroad in the service of the Government, either a part or the whole of a year's salary, and, in consideration of what I understand to be her present necessitous condition, I submit her case to Congress in order that the justice of such a measure for the relief of Mrs. Hopkins may be considered.

Mr. Hopkins received a recess commission, dated September 11, 1885, which was supplemented by one upon confirmation, dated January 13, 1886. He died at Monrovia, August 3, following. His salary was at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and there is a balance due his estate of about $640.

The widows of deceased diplomatic officers who have received compensation from Congress under circumstances identical with those of Mrs. Hopkins are as follows:

Mrs. Taylor, widow of Bayard Taylor, act approved March 3, 1879, $7,000;

Mrs. Hurlbut, widow of General Hurlbut, joint resolution approved July 28, 1882, one year's salary;

Mrs. Kilpatrick, widow of General Judson Kilpatrick, joint resolution approved July 28, 1882, one year's salary;

Mrs. Garnet, widow of Rev. H. H. Garnet, the predecessor of Mr. Hopkins, joint resolution approved July 28, 1882, one year's salary;

Mrs. Marsh, widow of George P. Marsh, act approved March 3, 1883, one year's salary;

Mrs. Venable, widow of William E. Venable, act approved December 23, 1884, $5,636.87, being balance of one year's salary;

Mrs. Wing, widow of E. Rumsey Wing, and Mrs. Hunt, widow of William H. Hunt, act approved March 3, 1885, one-half year's salary each; and

Mrs. Phelps, widow of Seth Ledyard Phelps, act approved August 3, 1886, one year's salary.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a report of the Civil Service Commission, made in reply to a resolution of July 22, 1886, in regard to the civil service rules and regulations and action thereunder. The communication, with the accompanying report, will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. The question of printing the document will be referred to the Committee on Printing, as it is very long.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory, remonstrating against adding any portion of that Territory to a State or another Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of the Ohio State Grange, praying for the passage of the agricultural experiment-station bill, and also the interstate-commerce bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I have in my hand certain petitions adopted by Grand Army posts in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of what is known as the Edmunds-Tucker bill on the Mormon question, whatever that bill may be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the polgyamy bill, which has passed the Senate, has been amended by the other House, and is now in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a very numerously signed petition from merchants and manufacturers of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of Frank Moore, of New York city, praying for suitable legislation to prevent the granting of any copyright for any historical or scientific publication that does not contain a complete analytical index of the contents thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GIBSON. I present a petition praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes, signed by sugar-planters, merchants, manufacturers, and mechanic laborers of Louisiana, who respectfully represent—

1. That internal taxation was resorted to by the General Government as a war measure, and should not be maintained during times of peace. A number of internal taxes which were impediments to commerce or were petty exactions which annoyed and cost the people more than they benefited the revenue were wisely repealed in 1883.
2. Others produce an enormous and unnecessary revenue, creating a surlpus which endangers the economical administration of the Government.
3. The tax on tobacco is an exceptional burden upon agriculture.
4. The tax on spirits requires an army of detectives and another army of soldiers to prevent illicit distillation, and keeps portions of the country in a disturbed condition. As spirits are largely used in the arts and in medicines, the tax on them is a real burden upon the people who use them for these purposes, or who consume the articles produced from them. Repeal of this tax would tend to do away with the injurious adulterations now extensively practiced.
5. The collection of internal taxes involves a supervision by the Government, which employs several thousand agents at a cost of millions of dollars annually.

For these reasons they pray that the internal taxes may be reduced as rapidly as the condition of the Treasury will allow.

This petition is signed by R. Milliken, Samuel Delgrado, J. G. Mory, Emile Rost, and many other gentlemen of high standing in the State of Louisiana. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SABIN presented resolutions adopted by the Saint Paul (Minnesota) Chamber of Commerce, favoring legislation for the suppression of cattle diseases; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. FRYE. I present a memorial or resolution from the John A. Hodge Post, Grand Army of the Republic, located at Canton, Me., warmly indorsing the bill that is known as the Edmunds-Tucker bill for the suppression of the practice of polygamy. As that bill has been reported, I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of H. C. Bradford and 40 other citizens of Boston, and the petition of W. Gray and a large number of other citizens of Boston, praying for a reduction of the special taxes on oleomargarine, so as to correspond with the annual license taxes on dealers in whisky, beer, and tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of citizens of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for a reduction of internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 97) for the relief of Basil Moreland, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment proposed by Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, to the sundry civil appropriation bill providing for an appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of War to repair the Signal Service cable at the mouth of the Columbia River, in Oregon and Washington Territory, reported it with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted, and moved its reference to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, and moved that they be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to James McLaughlin; and

A bill (S. 1563) granting a pension to James McLaughlin.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah E. Thompson, widow of William M. Thompson, late private in Company H, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported each with an amendment:

A bill (S. 3041) granting the Spokane and Palouse Railway Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation; and

A bill (S. 3026) granting the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Cœur d'Alene Indian reservation.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4594) for the relief of John R. Harrington, which provides for extending certain patents, direct me to report the same back unfavorably, with the recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I have been requested by some Senators to allow the bill to go upon the Calendar, and I ask that it may be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2993) to quiet title to certain land in the city of Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 2856) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7860) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; and

A bill (H. R. 9653) to amend section 3058 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3116) for the relief of night inspectors of the ports of New York and Baltimore, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3121) for the erection of a public building at Hanover, N. H., reported it without amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 574) for the relief of Robert Strachan, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 3179) to pay the Oregon Indian war claims audited by Philo Callender, war commissioner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3180) for the relief of Hiram Smith, of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3181) granting a pension to William Weist; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3182) for the completion of the monument to Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 3183) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill, and to establish the same as a post-road," approved June 16, 1886; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask unanimous consent that I may make a single statement touching the bill, because it may seem rather an unusual affair to offer in the Senate a bill to amend an act passed last year for the construction of a bridge across Staten Island Kill. I only wish to make this statement in order that I may impress upon the Committee on Commerce, to whom I ask to have the bill referred, an immediate consideration of the bill in order that some plan better than the one now devised may be made for the construction of the bridge.

The Secretary of War, under the power and responsibility imposed upon him by the act passed last winter, proceeded to call to his aid a board consisting of five engineer officers of the Army. They have reported adversely to the proposed bridge as embodied in the act of last session. The bill that I offer proposes a modification of the existing law so as to conform to the report and the opinion of the engineers appointed by the Secretary of War.

There is no disposition certainly upon my part, nor upon the part of anybody so far as I know, to interfere with the construction of the bridge. All we desire is that the bridge shall be built in a manner that will not seriously interfere with navigation.

A single sentence from the report of the board of engineers to my mind is sufficient to justify me in saying that this modification is needed and should be made. I read what they say on page 3 of the report:

It is thus seen that so far as tonnage is concerned this is one of the great water-ways of this country, and indeed of the world.

* * * * * * *

The water-way is at present a most important one, and will be of still greater importance in the future. The removal of a natural obstruction so serious as a pier in the middle of the stream would be urgently and rightly demanded even at great cost. The obstruction is not there now, and it should not be placed there to the injury of navigation, in order to save a few thousand dollars to the railroad company.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I respectfully ask that committee to take immediate action upon it, in order that we may arrive at some decision in the matter before the close of the present Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 96) for procuring a descriptive catalogue of certain documents in Europe, relating to America; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 97) providing for the printing of 4,500 copies of Finley's Storm-track Charts of the North Atlantic Ocean; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 3114) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of concurrent or other resolutions is now in order.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I gave notice yesterday that I should this morning after the conclusion of the morning business ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 10457) for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent upon their own labor for support, which was passed by the House of Representatives on Monday last. If there is nothing further in the way of routine morning business, I desire to make that motion at this time.

Mr. HOAR. I call up the report of the conference committee on the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. CONGER. Does that take the place of morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. Morning business is entitled to precedence.

Mr. CONGER. Has the order of "reports of committees" been passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the orders of morning business have been called, but the Chair will receive any such business now, if there be no objection.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3289) to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, to report the bill and recommend its passage without amendment. I ask to have an immediate consideration of the bill. There will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill now. Is there objection?

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask to have the bill read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, before the reading of the bill proceeds further I should like the attention of the Senator from Michigan one moment.

I presented an amendment to the bill, which was called to my attention by an eminent business man of Boston. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I called upon the chairman of the Committee on Commerce last Saturday, and he informed me that my amendment had been referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had expressed approbation of it, or had said that the Department saw no objection to it.

Mr. CONGER. What is the point covered by the amendment?

Mr. HOAR. I can not state exactly from recollection. I would have sent for it if I had known the bill was to be called up.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator——

Mr. HOAR. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President, if my friend will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill is the first thing in order.

Mr. HOAR. I asked to have the reading suspended, that I might make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the Senator may proceed.

Mr. HOAR. The chairman of the committee informed me that the matter would be laid before the committee on Thursday morning—this morning; and he now informs me, that it escaped his recollection and was not brought to the attention of the committee. Under these circumstances I ask my friend to allow this bill to lie over until to-morrow, in order that I may have my amendment brought to the attention of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I must object, under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say now, so that Senators may know it, that there are only two points in which the law is amended by this bill. The recital which has been read is of the present law, with the addition of one point as to passengers' baggage, and another point as to the size of the package where it can not be put into the prescribed safes. Those are the only amendments of the present law. The recital is a reprint of the section with these additions, so that Senators on looking at it will understand that all the provisions of the bill except these two are in the law now, and are merely recited again in the bill.

I will say, if the Chair will allow me a moment further, that there is great anxiety to have this bill acted upon early, and I desire to have the action of the Senate upon it. If the matter is to go over I shall call it up as soon as I look at the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and with the assent of the committee, if it is a proper one, recommended by the Department, I shall report in favor of the passage of the bill with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the matter passes from the consideration of the Senate I ask consent only to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question before the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply ask consent to make a suggestion in reference to the bill reported by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a statement to the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. MANDERSON. The suggestion is simply that there are many ports of delivery mentioned in section 7 of the act which is proposed to be amended, declared to be dutiable ports, but which by the order of the Treasury Department have been excluded from those privileges. I think they are eight or ten in number. What I desire to suggest to the Senator from Michigan is that this bill should be so amended that those ports shall have the benefit of the immediate transportation clause of the section. I hope that may be done.

Mr. CONGER. That can be done if they are authorized by Congress to be immediate ports of entry; but a port of delivery can not be so except by the special authority of Congress, specifying it in section 7 as a port to which the immediate transportation law applies.

Mr. MANDERSON. It has been done by the Department.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr CALL and Mr. HOAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. CALL. I desire——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida addressed the Chair. The Chair does not know for what purpose.

Mr. CALL. I desire to call up the resolutions which I was discussing yesterday when I was prevented from concluding my remarks by the desire of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business. I am entirely willing to give way for any matter which does not require any debate, but I presume I have a right to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has not yet a right to the floor, for morning business is still in order.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a privileged question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a privileged question.

Mr. HOAR. I call up the conference report——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that pending morning business that is not a privileged question.

Mr. HOAR. The morning business has been declared closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair——

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will pardon me, it is certainly my privilege to state my point. The Chair declared the morning business closed. I rose and called up a privileged report and yielded to another Senator for a special purpose. I think, while I am perfectly willing to yield to morning business, I am not to be taken off my feet by the Chair ruling that the morning business is in order as a matter of right. It was declared closed by the Chair expressly, and so announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to declare the morning business closed when morning business interposed. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rose to morning business, and the Chair, in accordance with the universal usage of the Senate, received the morning business. The very moment the morning business is over, the privilege of the report referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts attaches.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Chair if, under the rule, a conference report has not the privilege over morning business. I do not desire to press the right, but I so understand the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that until 1 o'clock morning business has privilege.

Mr. HOAR. I beg leave respectfully to enter an appeal from that decision, and I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the privilege of conference reports which takes a member who is speaking off his feet, and which is absolutely necessary to the finishing up of the business of the session in its closing days, always has been held to take precedence of morning business. Does the Chair claim that on the last day of a session the thirteen appropriation bills would have to wait until 1 o'clock before the conference reports upon them could be taken up? That would be a novelty in the history of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule and submit the appeal to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is very plain.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until this matter is disposed of, nothing is in order. There is an appeal pending.

Mr. CALL. I was going to raise a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question of order is pending, and until that is disposed of the Senator is not in order.

Mr. CALL. Is it not proper to suggest another question of order which may displace the one pending at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, pending a question of order. The Chair will read the rule under which morning business is conducted:

[RULE VII.]

* * * * * * *

2. Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the Chair, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the Calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. This is not a motion. Now, will the Chair read the rule as to conference reports?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read again from the seventh rule:

No motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee—

Mr. HOAR. This is not a motion to proceed to the consideration of the report of a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is. It is the report of a committee of conference.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will look at the rule with reference to reports of conference committees, he will see that it does not depend upon a motion. The report of a conference committee, which is absolutely necessary to the completion of the business of a Congress at the time of its adjournment, is always in order. It is in order even when a member is addressing the Senate to take him off his feet at any moment. That has been the uniform usage. When a member calls up a conference report it is in the power of the Senate to raise the question of consideration, and to postpone it or to refuse to consider it; but the calling it up, submitting the question whether it shall be considered or not, is always in order, under an express and separate rule, which overrides altogether the rule which the Chair has read. That rule is that no motion shall be in order except of a certain kind until 1 o'clock; but the rule to which I refer is that the submitting of a conference report shall be always in order. If, however, we stood on the matter of morning business, a conference committee is as much a committee as any other; and I might make my report under the call of reports of committees, if that were what we are proceeding on.

I beg to state to the Chair that I have no sort of desire to have this matter come up at this time to the exclusion of morning business. I make the appeal from the decision of the Chair merely that a precedent may not be hastily established which would work infinite mischief in the business of the Senate if it were established.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the appeal to the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. The rule to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers is Rule XXVII; which reads that—

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received, the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

If the conferees, in the morning hour even, presented a conference report, it would, in my judgment, be in order; but this report was presented several days ago and was received and is on the table. It can not be taken from the table without a motion; and, in my judgment, that motion is not in order before 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands the rules. The Chair does not desire anything except to get the fair construction of the rules. Construing the rules together, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that while the presentation of a report of a committee of conference has precedence, a motion to take up the report for consideration on a subsequent day must be treated like any other motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill upon the Calendar, which can be made only by unanimous consent until after the morning business is closed; after which the motion takes precedence of any other motion.

Mr. HOAR. This report was presented the other day, and it being desirable to proceed to something else it was withheld.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is journalized as having been made and as pending.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the Journal read on that subject. I am sure it does not speak of laying the report before the Senate for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will send and get a printed copy of the Journal.

Mr. MANDERSON. Pending the settlement of this question can we go on with morning business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the question the Senator from Nebraska asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

WHARTON'S DIGEST OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a concurrent resolution at the request of the Secretary of State, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That 1,000 additional copies of Wharton's Digest of International Law be printed and bound for the use of the Department of State, the binding to be under the direction of the Department of State.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CALL. I do not desire to object to routine morning business, but I wish to understand what my position before the Senate is. I was addressing the Senate yesterday on a resolution which I understood to be morning business. Pending my speech the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved to go into executive session, and I yielded for that purpose. I desire to know whether the resolution does not properly come up in the order of resolutions in the morning hour to-day, so that my remarks may proceed. I do not desire to interfere with any Senators who have business to present that will not take up time in discussion. I ask the Chair whether I am not entitled to the floor, not desiring to stand in the way of further routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has undoubtedly the right, by the established courtesy of the Senate, after the morning business, to call for a vote upon his resolution or to discuss it, subject however to the right of a committee of conference to make its report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is when we reach the order of resolutions. Whatever may be the rule, certainly, from the kindness of the Senator from Florida, yesterday, I should do all that I could to give him the opportunity to go on when he thought it necessary to do so; but I wish to appeal to him again, in advance of the time I shall make the motion, that after we have gone through with the pension bills, that we all wish to consider and deal justly about, he withhold concluding his speech for another day, until we can finish the subjects which we had under discussion yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the portion of the Journal which determines the exact status of the conference report is at the Printing Office, and can not be had at the present moment. Therefore, I will withdraw the appeal which I made.

I desire, however, to give notice that if the question should arise again I shall submit the appeal to the Senate. I am informed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] that the present occupant of the chair ruled the other day precisely in accordance with the claim which I now make, as he so understood it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think he did pending morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appeal is withdrawn, and there is no question before the Senate.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment to give notice that next Tuesday morning at the close of the business of the morning hour I will move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. 5) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, for the purpose of proceeding with the same until it is disposed of. It will be remembered that at the opening of the session, on the 8th day of December, this measure was before the Senate for final disposition, but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] being absent, he being a member of the committee and having made known his desire to be heard, it was decided to postpone the resolution with the privileges of unfinished business. That arrangement was made and assented to, and the measure was thus disposed of. The Senator from Georgia has returned, and I have conferred with him, and I understand him to say that he probably will be able to go on with the resolution by next Monday. I have fixed Tuesday, so that there may be no mistake. I will read—for it is but a few words—the understanding at the time the matter was postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL, the chairman of the committee said:

As the Senator says, others may wish to speak, and when we ascertain that, we can arrange when the vote shall be taken. In the mean time we can leave the joint resolution on the Calendar, so as to be called up at any time. It may be left as unfinished business, perhaps.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like that very much indeed, with the understanding that a vote be not pressed until a proper opportunity comes, after what has been said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SEWELL in the chair). If there be no objection, that order will be made, and the joint resolution will be laid aside, retaining its present position on the Calendar.

It was postponed with that understanding, and, as I have said, next Tuesday morning at the close of the morning business I will move to take up the resolution.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether a letter of the Secretary of State, with certain papers accompanying the same in regard to foreign archives, has been presented to the Senate this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was a letter from the Secretary of State presented.

Mr. HOAR. I desire that the letter and the accompanying papers be printed, both the letter and the documents accompanying it. The accompanying papers are letters from Mr. Parkman and other gentlemen high in authority as historians.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, before proceeding with the remarks which I was submitting to the Senate yesterday——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 7th instant.

The CHIEF CLERK. Resolutions of Mr. CALL to provide for the forfeiture of certain lands granted to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of a line of railroad from Fernandina to Tampa Bay, Florida.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, before proceeding I ask to amend the resolution by making it a joint resolution, and in the second paragraph, after the word "against," by striking out "all corporations" and inserting "Florida Navigation and Railway Company;" so as to read:

2. Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit through the district attorneys of the United States for an injunction against the Florida Navigation and Railway Company, or their agents, &c.

Then I propose to strike out the words "States or railroad companies," and insert the words "State of Florida."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send forward his amendments to the desk.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Florida if he desires to proceed with his remarks before we take up the conference report.

Mr. CALL. I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he desires it, provided there is to be no discussion of the subject.

Mr. HOAR. I presume there will be none.

Mr. CALL. With that understanding, I am willing to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield at this stage?

Mr. CALL. I will, after submitting the amendments. As I propose to amend, the resolution will read:

A joint resolution (S. R. 98) relative to the forfeiture of certain lands granted to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of a line of road from Fernandina to Tampa Bay, Florida:

Be it resolved, &c., That the grant approved May 17, 1856, granting lands to the State of Florida for the construction of a line of railroad from Fernandina, Fla., to Tampa, Fla., and from the Saint John's River, Florida, to Pensacola, Fla., should be forfeited as to all lands not earned before the time fixed in the act for the expiration of the grant, namely, ten years from the date of the approval of the act in May, 1856; and that the said lands so forfeited shall revert to the United States and be subject to homestead settlement, reserving to all actual settlers the right to 160 acres of land, and the right to enter, at the price of $1.25 per acre, 80 acres of land where they have purchased the same or the improvements on it; and that the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill to the Senate to this effect.

Resolved further, That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit, through the district attorneys of the United States, for an injunction against the Florida Navigation and Railway Corporation or their agents attempting to sell, or selling, or advertising for sale the lands of the United States embraced in the grant made to the State of Florida under the act entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," approved May 17, 1856, while bills for the forfeiture of the same shall be pending before Congress which have been or shall be recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

The joint resolution was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be modified as proposed, if there be no objection.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to take up the conference report on the bill (S. 9) fixing a day for the meeting of the electors for President, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report named by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand from the ruling of the Chair that doing this as a privileged matter would not displace the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], so that this being disposed of the Senator from Florida will be entitled to go on. I think it is fair to him that that should be understood.

Mr. CALL. That is my understanding, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida undoubtedly will have the right to the floor in the next morning hour, or at any time before 2 o'clock.

Mr. CALL. My purpose was to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts on the condition which he agreed to, that his report should be taken up subject to objection if there was discussion; that he would not insist upon it if it led to discussion. That was the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that this conference report was read when it was presented, and therefore the simple question is on agreeing to it. I wish to say that as agreed upon by the conferees of the two Houses, as I understand it and as I believe they understand it, it is in substance and, except in two or three lines, in the very form that the Senate have passed it over and over again; and so I suggest that it is not necessary to read the report again, but we ought to act upon it at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the reading is not called for, it having been previously read at length, the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, I do not intend to engage in any extended discussion of this report, but I merely wish to state, in the briefest manner possible, that I can not vote for concurrence, for the reason that I can not agree to the doctrine upon which this report is based.

As I understand it, it assumes to the two Houses of Congress acting concurrently the jurisdiction to determine and induce the circumstances out of which would spring the right of the House of Representatives to elect a President of the United States and of the Senate to elect a Vice-President. I do not believe that the Constitution contemplated a jurisdiction of that character in the two Houses of Congress; and inasmuch as I believe this bill proposes to assume a jurisdiction which, in my judgment, is prohibited by the Constitution, I shall content myself with voting against the bill, having expressed myself more at length when the Senate bill was before the body during the last session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 8834) granting a pension to Abraham P. Griggs;
A bill (H. R. 8835) granting a pension to Jacob Case;
A bill (H. R. 8836) granting a pension to John Miller;
A bill (H. R. 9129) granting a pension to Rebecca Wiswell;
A bill (H. R. 9167) granting a pension to Joseph F. Kirkhart;
A bill (H. R. 1171) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 3, 1884; and
A bill (H. R. 7616) for the relief of W. D. Havely.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I wish to appeal to my friend from Florida if he will yield to me to move an executive session. He was so kind as to do it yesterday, and I only ask him in view of existing circumstances whether he will not be willing to do so now.

Mr. CALL. I can not hope that the relief which I desire to obtain for these poor people in Florida can be had without the consent of the Senator from Vermont and other Senators. I think it important that we should decide upon the action which I ask at the earliest possible day, inasmuch as the lands of these people are now advertised to be sold, I think on the 26th or 27th day of January. The passage of this resolution by the Senate will, no doubt, be a declaration to the parties concerned that such a sale will be entirely illegal and void, and will give confidence and satisfaction to the people who are so seriously disturbed.

Now, if the Senator from Vermont thinks that the public interests will be better served by passing over this resolution at the present moment and going into executive session, leaving me the privilege of commencing my address upon the termination of the executive session, I shall yield to him. I submit it to his decision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will be better, because it is so late now that whether this resolution passes before or after the 26th of January will make no difference to what these corporate parties are likely to do; and therefore, sympathizing with the object my friend from Florida has in view—because I have known something about it in respect to two or three poor people down there—I think that the public interest will be best promoted by proceeding with our executive affairs at this moment. Therefore I make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I yield, with the understanding that I am entitled to the floor on the termination of the executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and forty-five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. MAHONE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 229) for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the words "one hundred and fifty" and inserting the words "two hundred" in lieu thereof; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3.

WM. MAHONE,
G. G. VEST,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SAMUEL DIBBLE,
THO. D. JOHNSTON,
W. D. OWEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT-STATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 21, at 12 o'clock m.

R. Brown Henderson, to be postmaster at Frederick, in the county of Frederick and State of Maryland.

Samuel L. Harvey, to be postmaster at Centerville, in the county of Appanoose and State of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the nomination of Samuel L. Harvey, to be postmaster at Centerville, Iowa, in place of Eugene C. Hoynes, suspended, submits the following report:

Eugene C. Hoynes, the suspended officer, is a disabled soldier, having lost an arm in the service of the country while a member of the Union Army during the rebellion. He was an efficient postmaster, and as such gave great satisfaction to the patrons of the office over which he presided. There are no charges appearing in the case in any degree affecting his integrity as a man or officer. His suspension was purely partisan, and in violation of the spirit of the law giving to disabled Union soldiers preference in appointments to civil offices. But he has informed the committee that he has no desire to resist the confirmation of his successor, in view of the fact that his character as a man and his integrity as an officer have not been assailed.

The nominee seems to be a man of good character and qualified to discharge the duties of the office. The committee therefore recommend that the nomination of Samuel L. Harvey be confirmed.

Frank P. Motie, to be postmaster at Odebolt, in the county of Sac and State of Iowa.

The above confirmation was accompanied by the following report from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was ordered by the Senate to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads having considered the nomination of Frank P. Motie to be postmaster at Odebolt, Iowa, in place of F. R. Bennett, suspended, reports:

That there appears from the papers in the case nothing injuriously reflecting on the personal or official character or conduct of the suspended officer. His suspension undoubtedly was induced by political considerations. The nominee appears to be competent to discharge the duties of the office, and the committee recommend that he be confirmed.

SAMUEL D. LEAVITT.

In connection with the confirmation of Samuel D. Leavitt as collector of customs for the district of Passamaquoddy in the State of Maine, the Senate ordered the publication in the RECORD of the following papers:

I, Samuel D. Leavitt, of Eastport, county of Washington, State of Maine, on oath declare and say, that I was born in Eastport, A. D. 1838, commenced business (law and insurance) 1864; have continued in same ever since; never was interested, directly or indirectly, in any merchandise imported into United States, properly or otherwise. In about 1866 a Mr. Horton, then in business at Campobello, New Brunswick, left in my office a package for a man (whose name I do not remember) to call and examine, which he did. This package said to contain 1 pound of morphine. Said package was taken away by same Horton. I was in no way interested in it; in fact I had no knowledge of the fact of contents when it was left in my office.

This was the pretended basis of suit against me, which was entered neither party, upon my paying costs or marshal's fees, which I did under advice of Hon. Bion Bradbury, who was my counsel, as this was cheaper than to defend. I never was even complained of for violation of any law.

SAMUEL D. LEAVITT.

STATE OF MAINE, Cumberland, ss:

DECEMBER 20, A. D. 1886.

Then personally appeared Samuel D. Leavitt and made oath that the foregoing statement by him signed is true.

Before me, STEPHEN C. PERRY,
Justice of the Peace.

PORTLAND, ME., December 21, 1886.

I have read the affidavit of Mr. Samuel D. Leavitt. The facts stated therein are in accord with the statement of the transaction made to me by him at the time of the suit against him. The settlement of the suit, as set forth by him, was made by my advice as his counsel to avoid the expense of the litigation.

BION BRADBURY.

[Confidential.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 14, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The President has recently appointed Samuel D. Leavitt, of Eastport, to be collector of customs for the district of Passamaquoddy, in place of N. D. Nutter or Nutt, who has been removed and whose term does not expire for more than a year. This Nutter is, I understand (though I am not sure about this), the editor of a Republican paper, and he was removed for that reason alone.

Some months ago I had an opportunity to examine the papers which had been filed by the applicants for the office, and among them I found a certified copy of the record of the United States district court at Portland, Me., showing that this same Samuel D. Leavitt had been convicted, somewhere between the years 1860 and 1869, of the crime of smuggling, and had been sentenced to pay a fine therefor.

Whether the President's attention was called to the matter or not I do not know. I have an impression that the paper was marked "Private and confidential." But it seems impossible that he could have appointed a convict smuggler to collect the Government revenues at a place which affords so great facilities for smuggling as Eastport does, and where it is of the greatest importance to have a collector who is free from any suspicion of the crime which it is his duty to prevent.

It is possible that the paper was secretly abstracted from the files before the other documents were taken to the President. At any rate it was there three months ago and it may be there yet.

You can easily prove the truth of what I tell you by sending to the clerk of the United States court at Portland for a certified copy of the record.

If what I say is true it seems to be the duty of the committee to investigate the case fully before reporting it favorably.

I have thus far refrained from giving any of these facts to the newspapers, although two of the New York dailies have applied to me for them. I shall wait for the action of the Senate before I make the facts public.

In case of the candidate's confirmation, I shall feel at liberty to make public all the facts, together with a copy of this letter, for I desire to know whether the Senate does really scrutinize the President's appointments when they have a good reason therefor which is not founded upon partisan politics.

As I am in the Government employ, you will see the necessity of my withholding my name for the present.

Yours, truly,

—— ——, Chief of Division.

Hon. S. J. R. MCMILLAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 20, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO AMERICA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a memorial from historical societies and other correspondence, and recommending provision be made for the preparation of a full and accurate digest and catalogue of documents and archives of Europe relating to the early history of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

EXPENSE OF COLLECTING REVENUE FROM CUSTOMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for defraying expense of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the ninth number of Statistical Abstract prepared by the Bureau of Statistics; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM OF GASPER ORTIZ.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting supplementary report of the Surveyor-General of New Mexico on private land claim, designated as the land grant to Gasper Ortiz, No. 87; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MRS. HENRIETTA M. DRUM HUNT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt, returned from the Senate with amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it in order to move to non-concur in that, and ask for a committee of conference?

Mr. HOLMAN. Report the amendment first.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, January 19, 1887.

Resolved, That the bill of the House 8869 entitled "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt," do pass with the following amendment:

In line 6 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty."

Resolved, That the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on such bill and amendment.

Ordered, That Mr. MITCHELL of Pennsylvania, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. WHITTHORNE be conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to non-concur and agree to the conference asked on the part of the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 3186) to declare the forfeiture of land granted to New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to said land, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move, by unanimous consent, the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that will not be done at this time.

Mr. PAYSON. I think this should go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill and amendments will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

JETTIES IN CHARLESTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (S. 2944) making appropriations for jetties in Charleston Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CELEBRATION OF DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of five members of the Senate and eight members of the House of Representatives be appointed to take into consideration the expediency of holding in 1892, in commemoration of the discovery of America, an international exhibition of the industries and products of all nations; and if such an exhibition should be deemed expedient, to consider the time, place, circumstances, and general plan thereof, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that be referred to the Committee on the Library, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as it proposes to invite South American States. I cannot see what the Committee on the Library has to do with it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, to refer it to the Committee on the Library, by substituting its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I submit that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND'S motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER'S motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois now asks, by unanimous consent, that the Committee on the Library have leave to report at any time.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

INDEX OF CLAIMS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 20, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the index of Southern Claims Commission reports, and claims referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman act, provided for by the resolution of the House, of the 2d of August last, has been completed, and is now ready for such action as the House may deem proper. I suggest that provision be made for continuing the index of claims referred under the last-named act, so as to include those referred during the present session of Congress, thus making it complete to the close of the Fiftieth Congress; and also that provision be made for supervising the printing of the same.

Very respectfully,

JOHN B. CLARK, JR.,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARRY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WEST, for the remainder of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BLAND, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same.

A bill (H. R. 356) granting a pension to Lucinda Barrett;
A bill (H. R. 429) granting a pension to Harry McElhinney;

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. MILLER (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10796) for the relief of depositors in the Freedman's Savings Bank at Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. MILLER also (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10797) to amend the laws relating to national banking associations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG CATTLE.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present at this time a telegram from the governor of the State of Michigan, transmitting a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State with relation to a bill pending before Congress, and simply ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

LANSING, MICH., January 19, 1887.

Please call immediate attention to the following resolution; copies for distribution will follow:

C. G. LUCE.

Joint resolution asking our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for and use their influence to secure the passage of the Miller bill (so-called) relative to contagious diseases among cattle, now pending in Congress:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Michigan, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to vote for and use their influence to secure the passage of the Miller bill (so-called), being a bill to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, and rinderpest among cattle, and to facilitate the exportation of cattle and the products of live-stock, and for other purposes, now pending in Congress of the United States.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress. This act ordered to take immediate effect.

JAMES H. MACDONALD,
President of the Senate.
DANIEL P. MARKEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved January 19, 1887.

C. G. LUCE, Governor.

Hon. J. C. BURROWS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the regular order.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to make a privileged report. The Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom was referred a resolution of inquiry directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, have instructed me to report it back with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives as soon as practicable, the sums of money which were owing to the United States on the 1st day of January, 1887, giving the sums which are due, principal and interest, under existing law, severally and collectively, from said companies, and what will be the result to the Treasury and the effect upon these debts if House bill 8318 should become a law and its provisions be complied with.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom was referred the House resolution referred to that committee on the 19th of January, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

There is legislation pending to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of the companies alluded to in the resolution. No information can be obtained from any reports made by the Departments as to the amounts owing the Government from the companies later than June 30, 1886. It is very desirable and almost necessary that the House be informed as to the true state of these accounts brought down to as late a date as may be had in order to a fair and intelligent consideration of such measures. The judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the effect and result of the provisions of the bill, should it become a law, is also greatly to be desired, so that the House may have the same before it previous to action on the measure. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the resolution.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. OUTHWAITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Some time subsequently,

The SPEAKER said: The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the fact that there was an omission in the resolution passed by the House calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to the indebtedness of the subsidized Pacific railroad companies. The words "from the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies," which should have been inserted after the word "owing," were omitted in the draught of the resolution. If there be no objection, those words will be inserted to accomplish the purpose designed by the House.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. It is the call of standing and select committees for reports.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with that call this morning.

Mr. HILL. I object.

Mr. CRISP. Then I move to dispense with the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That motion requires a vote of two-thirds.

Mr. HILL. I will not object to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, if I am permitted to submit a single report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up the report, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON AS A STATE.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Does the bill make an appropriation or require one?

Mr. HILL. It does not.

The bill was referred to the House Calender, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to dispense with the hour for the call of committees.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 57.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would this interfere with the consideration hour?

The SPEAKER. It would not. If the hour for the call of committees is dispensed with, the next order is the hour for the consideration of bills.

The negative vote being counted, there were—noes 9.

A MEMBER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. What gentleman made the point of no quorum?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I will make that point if I am not permitted to submit a report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY] being allowed to submit a report?

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I object.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DOUGHERTY].

Mr. CRISP. I think a vote by tellers will take more time than the call of committees for reports. I therefore withdraw the motion.

COURT AT DULUTH, MINN.

Mr. CASWELL, from the Committe on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 10421) to provide for a term of court at Duluth, Minn.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TREATY WITH CHINA.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 3044) to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States on the 5th day of October, 1881.

The SPEAKER. Does this bill make an appropriation?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. It does not.

The bill was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RUFUS BARKER.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 278) for the relief of Rufus Barker; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM L. CLARK.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1287) granting a pension to William L. Clark; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MAY H. STACEY.

Mr. BRADY, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10316) granting an increase of pension to May H. Stacey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY HELENA MAHAN.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to report back the bill (S. 1463) granting arrears of pension to Mary Helena Mahan. An adverse report formerly made in this case was withdrawn by leave of the House, and the committee now instruct me to make a favorable report.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANNIE E. GARDINER.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 2660) granting a pension to Annie E. Gardiner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8149) granting a pension to Jonathan Hayes; and it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WILLIAM H. CROOK.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 100) for the relief of William H. Crook; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bills (H. R. 1210 and H. R. 2267) for the relief of William H. Crook were laid on the table.

THOMAS A. M'LAUGHLIN.

Mr. DOUGHERTY, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1094) for the relief of Thomas A. McLaughlin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARET HIGGINS.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6610) for the relief of the estate of Margaret Higgins; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL GUARD COMPETITION.

Mr. COMPTON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10513) to provide for the maintenance of order in the District of Columbia during the National Guard competition and parades; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MONUMENT TO THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. O'NELL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Library, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 4780) for the completion of the monument to Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS IN TEXAS.

Mr. WINANS, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10203) to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken reach of Texas, and making an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call for the introduction of bills and resolutions. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at eight minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to call up the bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyright, and ask the present consideration of the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter, during the term of letters patent for a design, it shall be unlawful for any person other than the owner of said letters patent, without the license of such owner, to apply the design secured by such letters patent, or any colorable imitation thereof, to any article of manufacture for the purpose of sale, or to sell or expose for sale any article of manufacture to which such design or colorable imitation shall, without the license of the owner, have been applied, knowing that the same has been so applied. Any person violating the provisions, or either of them, of this section, shall be liable in the amount of $250; and in case the total profit made by him from the manufacture or sale, as aforesaid, of the article or articles to which the design, or colorable imitation thereof, has been applied, exceeds the sum of $250, he shall be further liable for the excess of such profit over and above the sum of $250; and the full amount of such liability may be recovered by the owner of the letters patent, to his own use, in any circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, either by action at law or upon a bill in equity for an injunction to restrain such infringement.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall prevent, lessen, impeach, or avoid any remedy at law or in equity which any owner of letters patent for a design, aggrieved by the infringement of the same, might have had if this act had not been passed; but such owner shall not twice recover the profit made from the infringement.

Mr. MARTIN. This bill is a Senate bill which has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Patents, and unless there be some objection to it, or some gentleman desires to discuss it, I will ask the previous question on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I think the report ought to be read.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I hope the gentleman will not press the demand for the previous question. Let us hear the report and hear what change the bill proposes to make in existing law and what necessity there is for it.

Mr. MARTIN. Very well. The Senate bill is the exact counterpart of a House bill which was reported by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MITCHELL]. The number of the report on that bill is 1966, and if the Clerk will read that report it will answer every purpose. There is no special report upon this bill beyond the fact that it is reported favorably.

Mr. BUCK. It might be well for the gentleman from Alabama to explain the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. I will explain it, if that is desired.

The report on the bill (H. R. 8323) (by Mr. MITCHELL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred House bill 5570, have considered the same and report it to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table, and that the substitute for said bill herewith reported do pass.

It now appears that the design patent laws provide no effectual money recovery for infringement. This is the result of the statute, as applied to the peculiar character of property involved, in a test case decided in April last by the Supreme Court of the United States. Since that decision the receipts of the Patent Office in the design department have fallen off upwards of 50 per cent. and the average weekly issue of design patents has also fallen off just one-half.

The bill provides a rule of recovery for infringement of design patents, merely supplying what the case referred to shows to be lacking in the existing law. To fail to pass this or a similar bill is a virtual repeal of the design patent laws.

Property in original designs (which are defined as works of art applied to articles of manufacture intended for sale and use) is a property of great and increasing value, intimately related to material progress in the industrial arts. This property was recognized in the statute books half a century after the adoption of patent laws for mechanical inventions, and after a body of case law and precedent had grown up around those patent laws and the sanctions and remedies they provided, and was recognized by the enactment of laws authorizing the issue of letters patent of the United States for designs, such laws providing that—

"All the regulations and provisions which apply to obtaining or protecting patents for inventions or discoveries, not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, shall apply to patents for designs." (Rev. Stat., secs. 4929–4933.)

The provisions which apply to protecting patents for mechanical inventions were first applied by the Supreme Court of the United States to the case of design patents in April of last year, to wit, in the case of Dobson against the Bigelow Carpet Company and the same against the Hartford Carpet Company, reported in the last volume of the United States Reports, and with the result of showing those provisions and remedies to be wholly and essentially inapplicable to the case of a consummated infringement of a design patent, the patentee being turned out of court with an admitted right, but without a remedy. The Supreme Court held in substance that the complainant must clearly prove what part of his own damage, or what part of defendant's whole profit on the articles made and sold was directly due to the appearance of those articles as distinguished from their material, their fabric, their utility, &c.; the design, to wit, the appearance, being the only thing patented.

It has been abundantly shown, even if any such showing were necessary, that the proof thus called for can never be furnished.

The court suggest that the difference in price between articles of equal quality, having, one the patented design and the other any other design free to be used, could be recovered under the existing statute; but it has been proved to your committee that designs do not increase the selling price, but only the quantity sold of the articles on which they appear. Again, license fees are unknown under design patents, the value of the property being as short-lived as the caprice of purchasers, and residing in the exclusive character of the use, the property somewhat partaking of the character and effect of trade-mark property.

Property in designs exists and is of value. The Revised Statutes provide for the issue of letters patent for such designs. Courts of equity will, by injunction, restrain present or future infringement of such patents. But for a past infringement, the profits of which have been realized, the existing law is found to provide no remedy, merely because the rule of damages prescribed by the statute is inapplicable to designs on account of their peculiar character.

The bill meets this emergency and provides a new rule of recovery for design patents.

That the emergency should be met is only to say that the design patent laws should be continued in force. To fail to meet the emergency will be a virtual repeal of those laws, for infringement is not discovered until the goods are in the hands of the dealers, and a design patentee cannot practically get out injunctions against all the dealers even if he were willing so to sue those who are also his own customers. The law is practically a right without a remedy if no way is provided of reaching the infringing manufacturer, and is a nullity.

The design patent laws, unlike other patent laws, do not increase the price of the articles affected. This was satisfactorily proved before your committee. Designs are fast sellers or slow sellers, and are valuable accordingly. The sole remuneration to the manufacturer for his large outlay in originating designs is in the increased sales he makes thereby. The design is merely the principle of selection in the purchasing of articles of manufacture.

So far as the designers are concerned they create a property for which they have a right to demand protection. Design patent laws preserve to them that property for a short term of years after publication, which is the time when that property first becomes of any money value. Women are entering this profession. Design schools have been started within the last decade in several of our large cities. The protection intended to be granted, and until April of last year supposed to be granted by our design patent laws, had fostered a rapid growth in this profession—a profession the products of whose labor lose by the common law the character of property when utilized, that is, when published, and which is therefore wholly the creature of statute.

So far as the manufacturers are concerned, who embody these original designs in articles of manufacture, it was shown before your committee that the four or five leading carpet manufacturers in the country expend each from $50,000 to $60,000 a year in salaries to designers and in the incidents of designing before a yard of carpeting is begun to be made for sale. It was also shown that the advance in the last few years in the application of art to the industrial pursuits had been rapid and great, and was largely due to the existence of design patent laws, and that this growth had been coincident with a steady decline in prices. It was also shown that the effect of design patent laws was to cheapen production and so ultimately to reduce prices, because it enabled the manufacturer to run longer on a given design than he otherwise could, and thus avoid changing machinery.

So far as the consumers are concerned, the effect of design patent laws that are respected is to give them more beautiful carpets and wall-papers and oil-cloths for the same money, and even for less money, with a tendency to encourage the purchase of articles of standard qualities as opposed to shoddy imitations, which is a true economy in individuals and so in masses.

The rule of recovery prescribed by the bill prevents the infringer from actually profiting by his infringement. The patentee recovers the profit actually made on the infringing article if he can prove that profit, that is, what the infringer realized from the infringing articles minus what they cost him; but the patentee recovers nothing beyond that profit, the capital and labor invested being left with the infringer just as it was before the infringement. The copyright law goes far beyond this, for there the capital and labor are forfeited to the owner of the copyright, and there is a heavy penalty in addition, and also a right to recover any other damages that can be proved. It is expedient that the infringer's entire profit on the article should be recoverable, as otherwise none of his profit can be recovered, for it is not apportionable; and it is just that the entire profit on the article should be recoverable and by the patentee, for it is the design that sells the article, and so that makes it possible to realize any profit at all, and the patentee is entitled to all the good will the design has in the market, and so, after the analogy of trade-mark law, is entitled to all the profit the infringer made on the goods marked.

But to meet the case of an infringement actually committed without profit (which would in the majority of cases be the infringement most damaging and disastrous to the patentee as a manufacturer), and to meet the case when the exact profit in dollars and cents can not be proved under the severe and technical rules of the law (and this would not infrequently occur with defendant the only witness, and his books the only evidence), the bill prescribes a minimum recovery of $250. This is necessary to any effectual protection of so intangible a property. It is a recovery certain and simple, and will command for the design patent laws a respect which is the patentee's greatest protection. It is the method of the English statute which prescribes a recovery of £50 on proof of violation of a design registration, a law that has been in successful operation for upwards of forty years. The amount prescribed seems to be the average amount that will work substantial justice in the long run, taking into account all trades and industries that are likely to avail themselves of the design patent laws. The violation spoken of in the bill, for which the sum certain is made recoverable, would be all that the infringer had made or sold of the infringing articles between the day the patent issued and the day the suit against him was begun; and if the article made was in itself small and cheap, the quantity made would be likely to balance this and make the minimum recovery specified not too large.

The bill provides only for recovery from the manufacturer who manufactures for purposes of sale, and from the dealers who can be proved to have been in actual conspiracy with such manufacturer in the infringement, and therefore an innocent dealer or user is not affected.

The bill has reference to an infringement by the use of the design patented or of any colorable imitation thereof. The last phrase does not extend the present rule as to what constitutes infringement of a design patent, but merely expresses and adopts it. (See Gorman Manufacturing Company vs. White, 14 Wallace Reports.)

The bill leaves the present design patent law just as it is, and in its second section saves all the rights of defendants against any possible double recovery for the same infringement.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. MARTIN. That report, as the House perceives, is a very elaborate one, covering all the points, and it seems to me that it leaves very little to be said. Therefore, if there be no objection to the bill, and if no member wishes to discuss it, I will now renew my demand for the previous question, in order to put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. To what particular kind of designs does this bill apply?

Mr. MARTIN. It applies to designs for carpets, oil-cloth, wall-paper, &c. The object of the bill is nothing more nor less than to enable a party to enjoy the benefit of his patent. Under a recent decision of the Supreme Court, it is quite impossible for him to recover anything by an action for damages in the case, or to protect himself by means of an injunction. The recent interpretations given to the two statutes referred to are of such a character as virtually to annul the patent law with reference to designs, and this bill is intended to remedy that. We have found no one who wishes to have the patent law in respect to designs changed or set aside, but we have found a great body of persons who are engaged in the manufacture of goods in which designs are the principal feature and who are clamorous for this legislation. I will state further, for the information of the House, that I presume no subject has been more elaborately or more ably discussed during the present session of Congress than this bill which we are now discussing.

This measure was brought up for consideration in the Senate; and parties interested in the question appeared before the Senate committee. The whole matter in all its length and breadth was taken up and most thoroughly discussed. Every objection raised was answered and entirely overcome to the satisfaction of the Senate committee, who, I am informed, made a unanimous report in favor of the bill.

The bill was then considered by the Committee on Patents of this House, and the same elaborate discussion of the subject was had, every solitary objection which was raised being answered; and the House committee unanimously directed a favorable report of the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will my friend from Alabama kindly say whether any estimate has been formed as to the amount of property which will be covered annually by this bill?

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know that I can make any statement on that point.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. How much is the bill worth to these manufacturers?

Mr. MARTIN. Well, it is worth a great deal to them, because it is believed the bill will operate very effectually in preventing these infringements. It is not expected that any great amount of damages will be recovered. The object is simply that, after manufacturers have expended their money in getting artists to furnish these designs which add value to carpeting, oil-cloths, wall-paper, and things of that sort, the advantages to which the manufacturers are entitled by reason of securing these designs, shall not be taken from them by infringements.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman will allow me to say that the passage of a bill of this kind has been made necessary by reason of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN. Practically, under the existing law, no damages can be recovered in a case of this kind.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama be kind enough to explain what is intended by the phrase "nor any colorable intimation thereof?" Is not that language a little too strong?

Mr. MARTIN. I am really not prepared to answer the gentleman in the way I would like to do, because I do not pretend to be as familiar with the language employed about patents as, perhaps, I ought to be, in order to answer him.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from Alabama will allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the language referred to applies to a case where the imitation is substantially like the original, although not practically the same.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not, then, use the word "substantial" instead of "colorable?"

Mr. BUCK. Possibly that language might be sufficient; but I can see no objection to the language used in the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It has been held over and over again that the imitation must be practically the same thing; must be so close an imitation as to mislead anybody.

Mr. BUCK. The difficulty at present is that after these manufacturers have obtained from artists valuable designs and have applied for patents, some other person, interested in the same branch of manufacture, comes in and copies the design; and within a few days after the issue of the new patent other manufacturers will be found making carpets or wall-papers the design of which is colorably or substantially an imitation, though not exactly the same; and in this way the sales of those who honestly secure designs and have them patented are seriously affected.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to my friend from Maine that I do not see that any mischief can result from retaining in the bill the word "colorable," because the expression is one which is well understood in connection with patent law, besides having, as a general legal term, a peculiar technical meaning, which is well recognized.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. In cases of violations of patents under the existing law the plaintiff recovers simply the damages which accrue to him by reason of the unauthorized use of his patent. Does not this bill undertake to give to the man whose patent is infringed all the profits made on the article embodying the infringement, whether those profits arise from the use of the design alone or from various other circumstances which may enter into the manufacture?

Mr. MARTIN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that when this bill was before the Committee on Patents that question was asked, and it was stated explicitly that no such purpose was had in view by any one who favored or urged the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCK. The language of the bill will not allow that.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have asked the question for this reason: In the decision which has been referred to, the Supreme Court held that in cases of this kind there can be no recovery except for actual damages sustained by the unauthorized use of a patented design; and it is because of this decision that the Committee on Patents has reported this bill for the amendment of the existing law. Now the Supreme Court, in this case of Dobson vs. the Hartford Carpet Company, United States Report, page 444, says:

> This court has, in a series of decisions, laid down rules as to what are to be regarded as "profits to be accounted for by the defendant," and what as "actual damages," in suits for the infringement of patents; and no rule has been sanctioned which will allow, in the case of a patent for a design for ornamental figures created in the weaving of a carpet, or imprinted on it, the entire profit from the manufacture and sale of the carpet, as profits or damages, including all the profits from the carding, spinning, dyeing, and weaving, thus regarding the entire profits as due to the figure or pattern, unless it is shown, by reliable evidence, that the entire profit is due to the figure or pattern.

In that case, therefore, the court held that only such damages could be recovered as were shown to have accrued by the improper use of another man's patent. The concluding sentence of the paragraph is this:

> There is but one safe rule—the actual damages or profits, to be established by trustworthy legal proof.

This being the decision, the Committee on Patents now comes in here with a bill declaring not only that the infringer of a patented design shall be liable to a fine of $250 and the costs in the Federal court where he may be convicted, but if the whole amount of the profits on the goods sold to which the patent is fraudulently or without authority applied shall exceed $250, the plaintiff may recover the entire profit upon the article of product, without any proof that this arises from the use of the design in question.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say in reply to the gentleman, I can not put any such construction on this law.

Mr. HAMMOND. Permit me further. If that is not the right construction, then why undertake to change the law at all, for the Supreme Court have already declared in this case of Bigelow, in the one hundred and fourteenth volume, you can recover all actual damages you can prove; but you do not say in the act the damages here arising from the use of such patented design shall be recovered, but all the profits that the defendant has made on the article covered by the design.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I see it will be necessary for me to consume a little more time than I had intended in order that this subject may be brought fully to the attention of the House. The patent is obtained for a certain figure, or figures, which will be employed in making carpet, or oil-cloth, or wall-paper, or anything of that kind. Here is a piece of carpet with a certain design on it; we will take it for illustration. Suppose there is no design on that article at all, there would be the cost of spinning the thread and of weaving it by the manufacturer of the goods. It would be practically as good as with the design printed on it; but if it had not a design which attracted the eye and made it desirable, then no one would think of buying the carpet.

A man making carpet, or oil-cloth, or wall-paper, or anything of that kind, goes to an artist and gets him to furnish a design which he thinks will captivate the eye and fancy of the purchaser. The moment he gets a patent for that design there must be left in the Patent Office a lithograph of it; and that lithograph can be obtained by any one who wants it for a few cents. Those who infringe the patent purchase these lithographs of designs. They have a full description of the design and make an exact counterfeit, or imitation; so exact hardly any man can see the difference between them. What we want in the law is this—in the case referred to of Dobson against the Hartford Carpet Company the trouble was this:

The Supreme Court said to him, you are entitled to your action on the case to recover such damages as you say you sustained. Now what are those damages? Damages which exist by reason of the carpet being made more desirable by reason of the design placed upon it? Who can say? How far can we arrive at the measure of damages in reference to this carpet, which has been selected because of its design? I say it is practically impossible to fix anything but nominal damages in an action of that kind. No one can tell whether this carpet was bought purely for the design or not. No one can tell whether another piece having a different design would not have been selected. Men will disagree, in my judgment, as my friend observed in reference to it.

There is a law allowing a man a patent for his design. He has now two remedies: action on the case for damage for use of it, and relief by injunction to prevent the manufacture of the goods. Both of them, I will say, are practically useless and futile as means to be employed for preventing infringement. A design only lives for a year; and how can you prevent a man making a carpet of a certain design without knowing he is engaged in making it? How do you know he is making it? It can not be known until the carpet is made and put upon the market. The remedy, when the carpet has been manufactured and put on the market, is by the action on the case. The patentee had another remedy by injunction. Every lawyer knows the remedy by injunction is a preventive remedy, and that in order to avail yourself of the benefit of it you must know of the contemplated injury in time to prevent the commission of it. So I say the remedy by injunction for a man who has a patent design amounts to nothing. What this bill seeks to correct is sufficient, of itself, to commend it to all men.

We can not protect the man on his patent and in the possession of his patented rights unless we attach a penalty for the infringement of the same; and that is simply what the bill does.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In this case, as I understand it, no man will suffer either penalty or damage unless he willfully appropriates the property of another.

Mr. MARTIN. None whatever.

Mr. BUCK. And makes a profit on doing so.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask the previous question——

Mr. HAMMOND. Before doing that, I trust my friend from Alabama will permit me a moment.

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. I have no disposition to interfere with the statute proposed to be enacted, if it is correct; but we should certainly understand what we are doing. I see much force in what the gentleman says, but there seems an objection to this bill which I would like to have either corrected by an amendment or satisfactorily explained by the gentleman from Alabama. I appreciate the difficulties which he suggests, but is it not enough that in this statute you make the infringement of the patent a crime subject to a penalty of $250 fine by the courts, without giving additional damages to the infringed party and all of the profits growing out of the whole business of the man who infringes, although not one cent may have been received by him on account of the misappropriation?

Mr. BUCK. But many manufacturers would be willing and glad to pay $250 for the privilege of infringing.

Mr. HAMMOND. But if he infringes, as you suggest, he is liable to the penalty of $250 if he sells one yard of material; then he would be liable further to a penalty of $250 on the next bolt, and $250 on the next bolt, and so on indefinitely as long as he continued to infringe.

Mr. BUCK. You would have to bring so many different suits, and it would be rather an expensive proceeding.

Mr. HAMMOND. No; there would be no suit at all. You would go to the foreman of the United States grand jury and make your complaint. But you propose to do here what I do not believe exists in reference to any other law of patents, that is, to give to a man whose patent is violated or infringed the profits of the whole factory or establishment of the other man who is the infringing party, whereas he may have done it innocently.

Mr. BUCK. Allow me to suggest that it is not a criminal proceeding at all, but only a measure of damages against him.

Mr. HAMMOND. It says he shall be indicted and fined.

Mr. BUCK. No; but that he shall be liable, either by action at law or by a bill in equity, for an injunction.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no provision for an indictment, and it is not a criminal proceeding, as I read the law. It provides that the party shall be liable to a penalty of $250, and if the profit made by him on the infringement shall exceed $250 he shall be further liable for the excess of such profit.

Mr. BUCK. And he has got to be sued for it.

Mr. HAMMOND. I beg pardon, I was regarding it on a casual reading as providing for an indictment.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; it makes no such provision. I would like to ask my friend from Alabama one single question.

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any other instance where the party whose right has been infringed upon is entitled to recover a specific sum in the event of infringement, and, in addition, whatever damages may be sustained? This statute gives the party as liquidated damages the sum of $250 for such infringement, as well as whatever may be recovered for the infringement; and then the additional bounty which may be the amount made by the infringed party from the sale of the article which is in part the result of the patent. I ask, then, is there any other statute in the interest of patents that contains both of these provisions—one for the recovery of a specific sum in liquidated damages, not by way of penalty or a fine in criminal proceedings, but by liquidated damage in a civil suit, and also the additional damage which the party may have sustained?

Mr. MARTIN. I know of no other instance in the patent law or any need of any provision of a similar character. The necessity for fixing a certain amount as the amount in liquidated damages arises from the peculiar character of the subject patented; and parties have been enabled heretofore to recover nothing whatever on account of such damages by reason of the species of property which the patent represents. The object in putting in the further clause that the party may recover any additional damages is this: It is believed that this will be preventive in its character, and no man would be likely to infringe when a recovery against him for such infringement will involve the sum of $250, as well as the total earnings of the business from that source; because there are many cases where parties would be willing to pay $250 for the privilege of infringing, because the manufacture which he would undertake would enable him to make many hundreds of dollars on such a small outlay; and this provision is put in for the purpose of meeting the cases of those who are willing to pay for the privilege of violating the law.

Mr. CROXTON. It must be a willful violation?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does my friend think, in view of the large rights now possessed by the owners of patents that there should be so material an enlargement and extension of the benefits intended to be conferred?

Mr. MARTIN. In this case I think such an extension is imperatively demanded.

Mr. MARTIN. I now renew my motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed; there being, on a division—ayes 70, noes 10.

Mr. MARTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask leave to extend my remarks upon this bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the House bill on the same subject will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee on Patents has no further business to submit, the call now rests with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 9) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon.

PENSION FOR DEAFNESS.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5871) granting an increase of the rate of pension now provided for deafness. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the passage of this act, all soldiers and sailors who are now pensioned, or who may hereafter be pensioned, on account of total deafness of both ears, shall be entitled to receive the sum of $20 a month for such disability; and all soldiers and sailors who are now on the pension-rolls, or shall hereafter be placed on the pension-rolls, on account of disability from loss of hearing in a degree less than total deafness, shall be entitled to receive a pension proportionate to the rate provided herein for total deafness of both ears.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. COWLES. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 5871) which the Clerk will read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is only necessary to call the attention of the House to the rate of pension which is now prescribed for total deafness and compare that with the rates for other specific disabilities to convince every member of this House that these unfortunate pensioners have been very greatly neglected. The rate of pension fixed by statute now for total deafness is only $13 a month. If it was not fixed by statute the Commissioner of Pensions would be permitted to increase it under his judgment as he is for other disabilities, the rate of which is not specified by law.

The rate of pension for the loss of a hand or foot is now $30; and it seems to me that no gentleman will disagree with the statement that for a person to be totally deaf is a greater affliction than to have lost a hand or a foot. In fact, I can conceive of no greater disability except perhaps it be the loss of both eyes or the loss of both arms than for one to be totally deaf.

The present rate fixed by law for the loss of a thumb and one finger is $12; for the loss of a thumb and two fingers, $14; for the loss of three fingers, $12. So you may go through the whole long list and you will find there are none of these pensions for other disabilities with which the rate for deafness will at all compare.

I have inquired from the Commissioner of Pensions the number of persons now on the roll for deafness. In reply to this inquiry he informs me there are now on the roll for total deafness twelve hundred and thirty persons. This increase of $7 a month would increase the roll $103,000 a year. There are on the roll for partial deafness forty-one hundred and fifty-nine persons. Taking it for granted they would average about a half pension, there would be a further increase of $175,000, making an annual increase of the pension-roll of $288,000 per year. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate in my remarks a petition which has been presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in regard to this matter, but will not take the time to have it read.

I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The petition referred to by Mr. CONGER is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned disabled soldiers and sailors of the late war who are suffering from total, severe, and partial deafness, respectfully petition your honorable body to so amend the pension laws that we may be rated and classified in equity to the greatness of our disability.

As the law now reads ex-Union soldiers and sailors who are suffering from deafness are receiving pensions altogether disproportionate and inadequate to the disability received. The rating for our class, considering all things, is ridiculously low, so low as to make it look more like a mockery than an act of justice. In the different grades of deafness, partial, severe, and total (from our own personal experience), we find that it is almost impossible to secure employment, and when we do the compensation is so small that it will hardly support one, let alone supporting a family. The great majority of our class—90 per cent.—are unable to do manual labor and are compelled to seek employment that will relieve them from much exposure and fatigue.

When you take into consideration the faculty of hearing it becomes a serious obstacle, and is of prime importance, not only in the ordinary pursuits and business of life, but because it is the avenue (in our efforts) through which we provide for ourselves and families and through which we receive and enjoy most of the intellectual and moral pleasures of life. Indeed, hearing is next in importance to the sense of sight; by it we derive knowledge and instruction from teachers, lectures, sermons, and in social converse; it affords us pleasure by listening to the sweet tones of the piano, the organ, human voice, &c. It has been truly observed that "impairment of hearing in proportion to its intensity becomes one of the most severe afflictions incident to mankind; it is to some a greater loss than that of sight." To the naturally intelligent the loss of hearing will be more grievous than the deprivation of any of the other special senses, particularly to those whose daily resource and comfort is social intercourse; deprived of hearing they are deprived of all external source of happiness. Relative to the disability of deafness, if there is one class more deserving of an increase of pension than another that class is that afflicted with deafness. Any one who will fully investigate the matter in all its different bearings will fully agree on that point.

Compared with the pension granted for other serious disabilities, the deaf have received nothing but a mere pittance, by no means commensurate with the disability. Under the present law $13 per month (a full pension) is allowed for total or severe deafness in both ears, with a proportionate amount for partial loss of hearing in one or both ears. Just think of it, only $13 per month to those who are totally or very severely deaf. Is not this injustice? So far as the ability to secure employment or earn a support, severe deafness of both ears is a much greater disability than the loss of a leg above the knee or an arm above the elbow, and total deafness greater than both; not that we think the amount of pension our maimed comrades receive too much, but to fully illustrate our own disability we select this class. Let those who doubt the truth of this assertion fully investigate the matter, and see if it is not correct. What can a deaf man do? Stop and think before deliberating on our class of pensioners as to our claims for a more liberal rating for our disability. There are a great many things we can not do, with very few we can. We can not be a steamboatman, a railroader, merchant, nor a clerk, can not serve upon the police or fire department, can not be a street-car driver, nor an agent; we can serve in no vocation of life in which the language must be heard and where danger signals are sounded.

In very many cases where the deaf have a trade they can not follow it for their imperfect hearing. Look, for instance, at the profession, lawyers, doctors, preachers, teachers, &c. All these avenues of employment are practically closed to those afflicted with total or severe deafness, but not so to those with the loss of a leg or an arm; they can follow their vocation. Look again at the various classes of commercial and other branches of business, they are all practically closed to the deaf, but not so to the other class referred to. Look also at the trades. In this instance it is true that with the disadvantage loss of hearing causes, they are open to the deaf, and it is also true that with some few exceptions they are open to those with the loss of a leg or arm. In fact, there is scarcely any business of life for which total or severe deafness, if not an absolute disqualification (as it is for three-fourths of the vocations of life), it is, to say the least, a great hinderance and disadvantage, while there are numerous and many kinds of employment for which the loss of a leg or arm is practically but little if any disqualification, and yet what a vast difference in the rating of pensions for the two classes!

No one can conceive or realize the greatness and severity of the loss of hearing. It does not appeal to the eye and enlist the sympathetic feelings as does the loss of a limb and other visible disabilities, and is considered at first thought by many persons to be a slight affliction, while on the contrary it is a very serious disability when the earning of a support is taken into consideration, to say nothing of the pleasures of life from which the deaf are debarred.

The inward feeling of a deaf soldier can only be told and felt by those who have the affliction to bear. What a condition to be in; to see, yet unable to hear!

Seeing without hearing is but very little enjoyment to the deaf, and takes nearly all the pleasure of seeing away. We are condemned to a life of silence; no commuting of sentence until our last enemy captures us! Take the case of a deaf mute, born deaf, educated and trained from infancy in all the deaf-mute signs and language; they never knew what it was to hear the many sweet sounds the human ear is accustomed to, and so dear to those who at one time could hear.

Our condition is much different. We left our homes with all the vigor and health of manhood, having our full sense of hearing and seeing, when, by reason of disease or other causes, with no preparation for any sign language (in case of deafness), we were without much warning cut off from all sounds—deaf with all the word implies. Many are the dangers we are subjected to, not only after dark but through the day, in being knocked down by horse or vehicle, and must at all times be on the lookout for some new danger. To make our petition complete we will mention a few of the infirmities a deaf soldier is heir to in part:

Memory impaired; nervous prostration; great difficulty experienced after night in getting around, causing dizziness, with a staggering, stumbling, unsteady step, especially in stooping over, causes blindness, with an inclination to pitch forward; paralysis or numbness of feeling in the head; vertigo; loss of the sense of taste and smell; severe and acute pains in the head and ears; restlessness in sleep; depression of mind and body; susceptible to colds on the least change in the weather, which increases the disability; great difficulty to communicate with those who can hear, and more especially those who can not write; trouble in procuring remunerative employment, particularly those who are totally or severely deaf, and are unable to do manual labor; makes one feel all alone; a goneness, and sadness, with an aching desire that is intolerable to communicate and hear; all that helps to make life dear and a pleasure to every one who at one time could hear. Many imagine the deaf have nothing to disturb them in the way of distressing sounds and noises in the ears. In this they are greatly mistaken, as many have a continuous or perpetual roaring, rumbling, disagreeable noise in one or both ears day and night, without intermission. Others have three or four different noises at one time, &c.

This matter is derived and taken from our own personal knowledge and from contents of letters received describing the disability of comrades who are afflicted with deafness. There is no exaggeration or coloring to this petition, but plain facts for your careful consideration and investigation as to the merits and claims of the deaf pensioner.

Your petitioners would therefore most respectfully and earnestly pray for relief in our nearly total disability, and would ask your honorable body (for the causes set forth in this petition) to enact or amend the pension laws to increase the pension for total deafness in both ears to $50 per month, and where the disability is total deafness in one ear and severe in the other, or very severe deafness in both ears, approaching total, to $30 per month, with a proportionate rating for lesser degrees of deafness contracted in the service when in the line of duty.

Your petitioners will ever pray for right and justice to our class of pensioners, and submit to you this our petition.

Wallace Foster, captain, Company H, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, total deafness, Indianapolis, Ind.

R. K. Baird, private, Company E, Second Ohio Cavalry, severe deafness, Pickwick, Tenn.

Fred W. Fout, lieutenant, Fifteenth Indiana Light Artillery, severe deafness, Saint Louis, Mo.

H. C. Howell, lieutenant, Company G, One hundred and twenty-third Illinois Infantry, severe deafness, Martinsville, Ill.

William N. Foster, sergeant, Third New York Light Artillery, total deafness, Covington, Ohio.

George W. Walker, private, Company I, One hundred and twentieth New York Volunteers, total deafness, Kingston, N. Y.

E. L. Parsons, captain, Company F, Fourth New Hampshire Volunteers, partial deafness, Acworth, N. H.

William Simmons, United States Navy, partial deafness, Philadelphia, Pa.

Walter Lowry, private, Company G, Thirty-second Ohio Volunteers, partial deafness, Keyser, W. Va.

And 300 others.

Mr. COWLES. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot submit the motion for the committee to rise if any gentleman desires to submit an amendment. If no further general debate is desired, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COWLES] to offer his amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa what is the rate of pension now received by this class?

Mr. CONGER. Thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 3352, having had the same under consideration, report the accompanying substitute and recommend its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment sent up by the gentleman from North Carolina will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided said deafness shall have occurred by reason of injury received while in the line of duty and during active service in time of war.

Mr. CONGER. How will the bill read if so amended?

The Clerk read the bill as it would read if amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I now renew my motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken the Chairman stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 133, no 1.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 118, noes——

The CHAIRMAN (before the conclusion of the count). The hour for the consideration of bills has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 5871) to increase the rate of pension now provided for deafness, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. I call up for present consideration the conference report on what is known as the interstate-commerce bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], as a matter of privilege, calls up the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] has the floor.

Mr. CRISP. With the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL], I wish to say a word to gentlemen who desire to discuss this bill and to the House, in the hope of coming to an agreement, if possible, as to when the vote shall be taken. It is needless for me to say that if every gentleman in the House who desires to speak on this bill should get the floor and use the time that the rules would give him the 4th of March would find us still discussing the bill. While I recognize the importance of the measure, yet we all know that this is not a new question; we all know how business is pressing upon us, and, in view of these facts, I would like to have an understanding by which at some hour to-day we may have a vote upon this bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL], I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that this bill is probably the most important matter that has been presented to this Congress. It was discussed in the other branch some three weeks before the original bill was passed; the conference report has been discussed about two weeks, and now it seems to me that, inasmuch as several gentlemen desire to be heard upon the bill, we ought to allow the debate to go along to-day, let to-morrow be given to private bills, and have an understanding that the vote upon this bill shall be taken at 3 o'clock on Saturday. Then everybody will understand the bill; and the time, it seems to me, is no more than may reasonably be asked for the consideration of a question so important as this.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, anxious as I am to do no injustice to any member, in view of the condition of the public business and the history of this proposed legislation, I feel that I must, at least, test the sense of the House upon the question of taking the vote at some hour to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can not the gentleman call the previous question now, and settle the matter? Every man's mind is made up.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that even if the vote be postponed until 3 o'clock on Saturday, that will only leave five or six hours all told for the discussion of this bill. I do not think that is an unreasonable time, and if we can agree upon having a vote at 3 o'clock on Saturday, we will dispose of the matter satisfactorily, and give gentlemen, who desire it, an opportunity to be heard upon a bill which is so important to their constituents.

Mr. CRISP. How would it satisfy gentlemen to agree that the previous question shall be ordered upon the adoption of the conference report at the adjournment this evening—no vote to be taken this evening, but the debate to be closed?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I think the time suggested is not too much, three hours to-day and two hours on Saturday. In fact, it is a very brief time for the discussion of so important a measure.

Mr. CRISP. With such an understanding as I have suggested, we could meet to-morrow and take the vote upon this matter, and dispose of it without interfering to any considerable extent with the consideration of private bills.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that that gives us only about three hours to-day and one hour on Saturday.

Mr. RYAN. Then there is only one hour's difference between the two propositions.

Mr. CRISP. Personally, I should be willing, and I have no doubt that others would be willing to emulate the example set us at the other end of this Capitol and, if necessary, stay here until 10 or 11 o'clock to-night debating this bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. They are in the habit of adjourning over Saturday.

Mr. CRISP. I ask gentlemen to consider whether they will not agree that at the end of this session to-day or to-night the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why not agree to have the vote taken at 3 o'clock on Saturday?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Let the previous question be considered as ordered on Saturday at 3 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that this being a privileged matter, it can be called up, if the gentleman desires, on Saturday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CRISP. I understood that; but what is to be accomplished by postponing the vote until Saturday, if the debate is closed at the end of to-day's session?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It gives two hours for discussion on Saturday.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Suppose we have a night session.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This is a pretty large body, and a great many gentlemen do not like to come here at night. I do not think the time I have suggested is any too long.

Mr. CRISP. Gentlemen will allow me to say that Saturday is a bad day to be fixed for taking the vote—not for gentlemen situated like myself; but members whose homes are within a short distance of this city are often absent from the House on that day.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is their neglect, not ours.

Mr. CRISP. Now, why not agree to close debate at the end of the session to-night, and vote on the bill to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is, with the understanding that there shall be a session to-night for discussion.

Mr. CRISP. My proposition is that the previous question shall be considered as ordered whenever we adjourn to-day.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that there are many gentlemen who desire to be heard on this bill who are not members of the committee and who can not hope to obtain an hour; and therefore I think it would be for the general advantage to agree that debate at the evening session be confined to ten-minute speeches.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. Give everybody permission to print.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The gentleman from Georgia proposes, as I understand, that the discussion go on to-night, that the previous question be ordered at the adjournment to-night, and the vote be taken to-morrow.

Mr. CRISP. That to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, the vote be taken on the report, the previous question to be considered as ordered at the adjournment of this legislative day.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is a part of the understanding that we are to have a session to-night?

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir. I ask the Chair to test the sense of the House on the proposition I have made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that there be a session this evening for the discussion of this report—no other business to be transacted—and that when the House adjourns on this legislative day the previous question shall be considered as ordered, and that the vote be taken to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CRISP. Now, I ask unanimous consent that we have a session to-night. What hour do gentlemen suggest?

Several MEMBERS. Half past seven.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess to-day from half past 5 o'clock till half past 7 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at half past 5 o'clock to-day until half past 7 o'clock, the evening session to be for the discussion of this report under the order already made. Is there objection?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman to incorporate in his proposition a provision that the debate at the evening session be had under the five-minute rule.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition just stated by the Chair for a recess from half past 5 o'clock until half past 7? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I now request that debate at the evening session be had under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. That proposition has been objected to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is it in order to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that the debate this evening be confined to ten-minute speeches.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that in the discussion this evening each speaker be limited to ten minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that any gentleman desiring to print speeches in the RECORD on the pending bill may have the privilege of doing so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that any gentleman desiring to print remarks on this subject, or, as the Chair would suggest, to extend remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir; or to extend remarks.

The SPEAKER. May have leave to do so. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] is now entitled to the floor.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to consume more than a few minutes in submitting what I have to say on this report. The fourth section of this bill, or what is known as the long and short haul provision of the Reagan bill, was objected to, as I thought, with a great deal of force because it provided an iron rule which, by reason of its universality, might work hardship in individual instances. It is certainly true that cases were supposed, and cases may readily be imagined, in which, under the clause of the Reagan bill in reference to the long and short haul, great disadvantage and injury might be worked to the railroad transportation business.

A similar clause in the Cullom bill provided for what I considered the lodgment of a dangerous power of suspension in the hands of the railroad commission provided for in that bill. In other words, I understood under that clause in the Cullom bill the commission had the power to exempt a road from the operation of the long and short haul clause, and hence could break up a road not enjoying the favor of such exemption, and that power was too dangerous to be lodged in any tribunal or any set of men, commissioners or otherwise. The bill as reported by the conference contains both propositions. It contains not only the Reagan proposition of long and short haul, but also the proposition for the suspension of the operations of that section in particular instances only. The distinction is an obvious one from the power given in the Cullom bill to provide general rules for suspensions, and I think the original proposition has been bettered by the one now before the House.

There must be some way to give an equitable administration of the long and short haul clause, if there is anything at all in the long and labored arguments which have been made against it, and the prophesies of evil which are to follow its enactment. This proviso in the fourth section of the bill is to apply to the operation of this law that equitable jurisdiction which has been found to work well in every other department of law. It is to supply that wherein the law by reason of its universality is deficient, and which may work hardship in particular cases.

It would be an astonishing thing if this bill, the result of full and careful consideration on the part of both Houses, should be a perfect measure. The number of failures which have been made in England over this question are a part of the history of this subject. If this law is defective, like every other law, it will reveal its defects on being put into actual practice. In other words, every statute which is upon your books has had to go through the test of practical operation and the test of judicial interpretation and decision. If this law reveals patent and manifest impracticabilities, it will be an easy matter to remedy them when they are pointed out by experience. No gentleman knows what is going to happen about anything.

There is no prophet, or son of a prophet, on this floor or anywhere else. We have here the germ of legislation in a new field in which Congress puts its foot for the first time, and from that germ experience will develop the full growth which will govern all these great questions of transportation by railroad. There is but one way to get at it and that is to start the practical operation of the great principles of the common law. The question narrows itself down at last to this: Shall the principles of the common law governing common carriers be administered in the courts of this country or by commission? My preference would be to open the courts of the vicinage and leave the matter to local decision. But I am willing to yield that proposition and have the common carriers of the country governed by a commission, rather than not have them governed at all.

The principal objection I had to the commission bill having been removed, I will vote for this bill; not as a perfect code, for perfect codes are not now handed down from heaven on Mount Sinai or Pike's Peak, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] seemed to demand. The law is no longer a revelation, but it is a growth. Every law has to have that growth before it is perfected. It has at last to be decided on by the courts, and tested by experience.

I believe we are starting in the right direction; and I do not believe the long catalogue of woes and calamities that chambers of commerce, which have never read the bill, and which have been stirred up by these lines of transportation and induced to put on the mantle of prophesy—I say I do not believe the enactment of this law will be followed by such calamities and that everybody is going to be ruined. I believe there is no chartered sacredness about these great interests. I admit they are great. I admit the railroad interests of this country have been great factors in its development, but I do not believe there is any constitutional delicacy or weakness in them which will prevent them from flourishing under the principles of the common law, like every other enterprise charged with a public use.

I yield now for forty-five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for his courtesy in yielding time to me.

Before entering upon the discussion of the features of this bill it is well to consider the parliamentary position in which the House finds itself at present in relation to it. The pending motion is for the adoption of this conference report. There has been a Senate bill (the Cullom bill), there has been a House bill (the Reagan bill), and now comes, as a substitute for both, a bill presented for the first time to this House without the privilege of amendment, to be taken as it is or rejected as it is; and the first question is, what is the effect of a failure to adopt the conference report? Does it kill the bill? Not at all.

It opens the bill simply to a further conference between the two Houses. In that conference amendments which may be suggested, which have been already suggested in the course of this debate, may be incorporated; and there is no reason to doubt that, on such further conference, this bill would come back in ample time for the action of both Houses, improved upon in its present terms, by reason of the criticisms which it has received in the course of the debate, both in the Senate and in the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, supposing the result should be to defeat the bill; that the six weeks remaining of this session are not sufficient for conferees already familiar with the subject to get together and agree upon a proposition to present, and the bill is thereby defeated, I propose to advance some views in connection with my study of the bill which lead me to say that it would be better than the enactment of this bill into a law in its present shape.

The effect of enacting the bill as it is will be to throw into the courts for judicial determination and construction points which the two Houses can and should settle now. That difference of opinion, which is attendant (and necessarily so) upon this bill in its present form, will bring its ambiguities into litigation in the circuit courts and in the Supreme Court, and it will be five years before the highest judicial interpretation is given to the points which are at issue. The inevitable result, it appears to me, will be that the passage of this bill will set the subject at rest on the basis of its enactment and postpone the remedies which are required to correct the wrongs under which the people suffer to-day. There will be a truce of legislation, as it were, while the matter is being fought in the courts, and it would be infinitely better, in view of the ambiguities of the bill and the uncertainty of its meaning, that it should be postponed to another Congress rather than be passed and throw the subject into the courts on such a statute as this.

I do not believe, sir, that it is the part of Congress to agree on words while not agreeing to the sense of those words. What is the meaning of judicial interpretation of statutes? It is the determination of the legislative intention. It arises only where the legislative body, through inadvertence in the use of words, fails to declare its true intention; but it is a remarkable position for the legislative branch of the Government to assume, when it voluntarily uses words interpreted by one in one sense, and by another in another, and then votes on these words; for they are really, when they come to vote in such cases, voting on distinct propositions, and there is no consensus of legislative intention.

When one member says, "I will vote for that phraseology, because it means so and so," and another says, "I will vote for it because it means exactly the reverse," I say in that case there is not that consensus of legislative intention which marks the proper enactment of law. Let us put what we mean in plain and unambiguous terms. We do not have courts constituted to arbitrate legislative differences, and to take the chances of their arbitrament, and I have only to refer to this debate to show that there are serious differences not only between the members of the two Houses but between the members of each House as to the meaning of certain words used in the bill.

It appears to me that the gravest objection to this bill is contained in the powers conferred upon the commission. I have no objection to a commission exercising proper functions, but as I read this bill, it seems to me that Congress confers upon that commission legislative powers. Now, under the Constitution the three departments of the Government are to be kept distinct in their operations in their agencies.

Under the Constitution all legislative powers shall be vested in the Congress.

The fourth section of this act, in the long and short haul clause, provides certain legislation on that subject, but is followed by this proviso:

Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is conferring legislative power. It is the power of suspending the operation of the statute, not in certain cases specified and laid down by Congress, but in the discretion of the commission itself. I grant that Congress might pass a statute general in its terms, and provide exceptions, and say that when those cases arise the executive department may proclaim a suspension. But there is no way to put that suspension of the statute in the discretion of another body without delegating to that body legislative power which the people have delegated to us; and our delegated power can not be thus delegated, and not only is it legislative power, but it is special legislative power. The commission has no power under that fourth section to establish a general principle, a general rule of exception applicable to all carriers alike.

That section first gives to the commission the power to exempt a certain common carrier in a special case—just one case; and then it goes on and says it can exempt that common carrier (not a class of common carriers, but that single common carrier) in a certain class of cases. It gives to that commission the power to say to one railroad, "We will release you from the provisions of the long and short haul clause," and it gives them the power to say to another railroad, "We will not release you." But it nowhere confers the power on the commission to say, "We will exempt this railroad and all other railroads in the same class from the operation of the long and short haul clause." The language is explicit:

Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Note that the words are "such designated common carrier." The commission can only act upon particular common carriers, and can not establish a general rule of exceptions. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is a terrible power over the transportation of this country——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Favoritism, too.

Mr. DIBBLE. Where competition is so active, where influences so powerful can be brought to bear upon five men, where representations so strong will be made; why, sir, it has the power to make fish of one and flesh of another, and the only way in which they can act tends to favoritism and partiality. I object to it on that ground; and to my mind, Mr. Speaker, that seems to be a fatal obstacle to the passage of this bill in its present form.

Let us look further into the question of the power of this commission. While in that particular it is endowed with legislative faculties, in another it appears to have judicial functions bestowed upon it. Let us cite a case. Take section 15. It appears by the terms of this act that this commission acts judicially in three ways, either on the complaint of a party who claims to have been injured, or at the request of a State railroad commission, or of its own motion.

Now, suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a railroad shall have committed an act of injustice against some citizen, and that citizen desires to exercise the option, which this act purports to give him, of going into the courts of the country rather than to go before the commission, why it is in the power of that commission, of its own motion, to initiate proceedings and have an investigation; and if it should so happen that the commission investigating that grievance should find against the railroad company, and should impose by way of reparation some insignificant penalty—some insignificant amount of damages, if you please, to be paid to that complainant—why, sir, whether that complainant acquiesced in this process or not, under this bill the payment of those insignificant damages, the making of that insignificant reparation, relieves that common carrier forever from the criminal and civil consequences of that act. And if the commission happens to get ahead of the complainant in initiating the investigation before he files his complaint in the court (and perhaps in other cases, but certainly in that), the action of the commission nominally against the carrier, but really in his favor, would be cited to make it res adjudicata, and bar his right of recovery in the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. ROWELL. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. DIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROWELL. If the proceeding is instituted by the commission, and not at the request of the party, is he by this bill barred?

Mr. DIBBLE. I will read the words of the bill. I think he is explicitly barred of recovery, and I will show that very plainly. It says that "in any case in which an investigation shall be made;" any case; and just before that it provides the three ways in which it can be made. First, by the complaint of the party; secondly, by the request of the railroad commission of a State; thirdly, it may institute any inquiry in its own motion in the same manner and to the same effect as if complaint had been made. Now, if it is to have the same effect as if complaint had been made, I think that answers the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Then there is another injustice which appears amid the mass of language composing this bill.

It is this, Mr. Speaker: While an option is apparently given to the complainant to go to the courts or to go to the commission, if he ever gets before the commission there is no right of review or appeal for him. By ingenious phraseology the right of appeal to the courts of the country is given to the common carrier, but I do not find that the same right is given to the complainant. What does the bill say? It says, in substance, that if the commission should happen to find adversely to the carrier—not that the carrier shall take a regular appeal, but it gives him practically the right of appeal, because all he has to do is to refuse to obey the finding of the commission—then, in case of his refusal to acquiesce in their decision, the commission may carry the question to the courts for adjudication, and where the amount involved is $2,000 to the Supreme Court of the United States. But I fail to find in the act any provision for carrying the question into the courts when the decision is adverse to the complainant.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is none.

Mr. DIBBLE. The appeal, therefore, from the decisions of the commission to the regular tribunals of the country is given to the common carrier, and is not given to the party who complains. I say that such a provision in the conferring of judicial powers is a violation of all the principles that should govern appeals, and this appeal is very singular. The commission can find damages like a special jury, and can say: "This complainant has been injured so many dollars, and you must pay so much by way of reparation." But instead of going on and appealing regularly the common carrier simply sits down and does not do anything at all; he simply disregards the finding of the commission. Does he suffer for contumacy? Not at all. Does his course increase the damages? Not at all. The case is carried to a court, and that court sits as a court of equity, and a court of equity does not assess damages.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman please point out the section of the bill that authorizes any appeal at all by any person. According to my understanding of the bill, it does not contemplate that any appeal will be taken.

Mr. DIBBLE. I will go over the ground again. I have already stated distinctly that there is no formal appeal granted, but I say there is a provision in favor of the common carrier which is equivalent to an appeal. I will explain my meaning again. The bill provides that in case the commission decide that the common carrier has to make reparation to such an amount, or to pay such and such damages to the claimant, they shall notify the common carrier of that decision. Then, if the decision be disregarded by the common carrier, the commission has the right to take it to court, and that right is given only in a case where the common carrier disobeys the decision. Therefore, the mode of appeal provided for the common carrier is to disobey the decision of the commission, and that will give him practically all the rights of an appeal in a form heretofore unknown to the jurisprudence of this or any other civilized country, so far as I am informed.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, the bill simply provides that means of compelling obedience on the part of the common carrier. It is not a provision for an appeal, but it is the method which the commission must use in order to effectuate their decree.

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is distinctly asserted in the act that the decision of the commission, when that mode of compelling obedience is adopted, stands exactly like the decision of an inferior court. The bill provides that on an appeal to a higher court the decision of the commission shall not be conclusive, but only prima facie. That opens the defense and gives practically an appeal and a review upon appeal to the common carrier in the higher court. If the report and the findings of the commission were to be conclusive in the higher court, then I grant that the position of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] would be well taken; but when it is simply prima facie, that puts the decision of the commission exactly in the position of the judgment of an inferior court when an appeal is taken to a higher court, and gives the common carrier the right to put in a case against that prima facie case, and to do substantially all that he would have a right to do on a regular appeal.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DIBBLE. With pleasure.

Mr. CRISP. I am not certain, Mr. Speaker, that I apprehend the gentleman's argument. The bill provides that when complaint is made to the commission they may investigate, and if they think proper order the carrier to desist from the practice complained of and to pay certain damages. The commission have not, I agree, the power to force the carrier to comply with their order. If the carrier fails to comply with the decision of the commission then the commission or the individual can go into court and enjoin him, pending the litigation, from the continuance of that practice; and when the case comes into court the report of the commission stands exactly as the report of an auditor or master in chancery would stand in a case in court; it is prima facie true on the facts. That is all.

Mr. DIBBLE. But the distinction I draw is this: Of course this is the exercise of judicial power by the commission. Suppose the commission, instead of finding adversely to the carrier, should find adversely to the complainant; there is no way for him to get his case into court. But there is a clear way—although it is a roundabout way it is a clear and plain way—by which the common carrier may get the adjudication of a court. The complainant, however, by going to the commission, has taken his election and can not go to the court; he has no way to get there.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman will allow me to say—of course I do not wish to inturrupt him—that is exactly what the bill contemplates, that the party who thinks he is injured shall have his election to go in the first place to the courts and set up his case like any one else or to go before the commission. If he goes before the commission he is bound by their judgment, and ought he not to be?

Mr. DIBBLE. I do not think he ought to be bound by the judgment of the commission unless the other side is also to be bound by the judgment of that commission. I do not think there is any fair judicial tribunal that does not give the same right of appeal to the plaintiff who has elected to go there that it gives to the defendant who makes his answer. I can not conceive or admit that it is fair that the complainant, in case of a judgment adverse to him by the commission, should not have the same right as the common carrier to get the judgment of a court upon it, or to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Yet under this bill one party has a practical way to go to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the other has not.

But, Mr. Speaker, as time is passing, there are one or two other points in this bill——

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman passes from this branch of the subject, I desire, if it will not interrupt him——

Mr. DIBBLE. Not at all.

Mr. HEPBURN. I wish to call his attention to line 13, page 29 of this bill, where he will find the following language:

And nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law, or by statute.

Now, if an individual would have the right under the existing law to go to the courts, would he not still have that right under this bill, although he might have elected first to go before the commission? In my judgment, this provision is clear and explicit.

Mr. DIBBLE. There is an express clause in the bill to the contrary. It is to be found in section 9:

SEC. 9. That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the commission as hereinafter provided for, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such common carrier may be liable under the provisions of this act, in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt.

Mr. ROWELL. Does not that clause, as I have already suggested, provide that only such proceedings as are instituted by the commission upon the request of the party complaining bar him—not proceedings instituted by the commissioners on their own motion?

Mr. DIBBLE. I concede the position the gentleman takes. I have never maintained the contrary. The distinction is this: in a case where the commission, of its own motion, takes the initiative, makes a determination and mulcts a common carrier in an insignificant sum named as the reparation in a particular case, that does not bar the complainant of his election to go into court; but when he gets into court that is pleaded against him as res adjudicata. Therefore he is estopped, because the other section provides that he can not enforce any further liability or penalty, including both the civil and the criminal branches of the subject, if there is an adjudication against the common carrier, however small, and the carrier complies with the terms of that adjudication. That is a provision of this bill. If I had time I would like to read it again to satisfy the gentleman; but he can read it for himself. When the commission commences an investigation of its own motion, it of course must summon both parties interested. This does not bar a complainant from going into court, but the relief is barred if the common carrier has complied with the decision of the commission as to reparation, made in a proceeding on the motion of the commission, begun prior to his suit. There is another part of this act, Mr. Speaker, which I approach with some hesitation, as there is in it a good deal of that ambiguity which is one of the objections to this act. I refer to the provisions with reference to the long and the short haul. Now, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, who so ably advocated the adoption of this report two days ago, in his definition of the word "line" in the fourth section of this act. I agree with him where he says in relation to that—

I do not understand that the word "line" as used in that section means anything different from road as defined in the bill:

"The term 'railroad' as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease."

We agree, then, that the word "line" is synonymous with the word "railroad;" and if that be the case, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that some of the instances which have been cited in this debate would not find in this act anything applicable to them. An instance was cited of 76 cents a hundred for freight from New York to New Orleans, and $1 a hundred on freight from New York to Atlanta. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the word "line" means "railroad," neither the route from New York to New Orleans nor the route from New York to Atlanta is embraced within the terms of the bill, because there is no provision in the fourth section for a long and a short haul over connecting lines, but the language refers only to transportation over the same line.

If that line means one railroad operating under one control and one management there is nothing in that section which forbids discrimination on a through route. Let us take the language of the section, and let us compare it with the language of the preceding section. In section 3 of the bill we have the word "line" again where it speaks of the common carriers giving equal facilities for interchange of traffic "between their respective lines"—"and delivering passengers and property to and from their several lines and those connecting therewith"—"and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines." That is through travel. There is nothing like that in the fourth section.

And instead of providing it shall be unlawful for a common carrier to receive greater compensation for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or over connecting lines, the words "connecting lines" are left out, and, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] says, that simply means over the same railroad. Then the question comes down to this:

Suppose a complaint is made against a single common carrier. And by that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to explain I accept the term railroad to mean the railroad itself and all the lines controlled by it, whether leased or otherwise. For instance, I would call the Piedmont Air-Line, controlling half a dozen connecting roads, a single railroad for the purpose of this act, because they are all under one management; but I would not call the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Piedmont Air-Line Railroad as one in this act, because, while they connect and have an agreement, under the third section, for the interchange of passengers and traffic, and have an agreement for joint tariff, they are not actually operated under the same management. They would constitute two railroads, or lines of railroad, and are not the same line.

The question arising here may be put in this way. It is true, nobody can complain except against a single common carrier which has charged for passage over the whole of its line less than the charge on its local tariff for intermediate points. Then comes the inquiry as to the meaning of these words: "Substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, in this very bill the joint tariff for connecting lines is recognized as being different, and not "substantially similar" to the "circumstances" of the local tariff. It provides every road shall post its local tariff, or keep it in an accessible place, so the public can see it. It also provides that it shall be filed with the commission. It is also provided that it shall exhibit its local rates from every point of departure to every point of destination upon its line of road.

What is the provision as to joint tariffs? It is that the joint tariffs need not be published; they are to be filed with the commission, and we then leave it to the discretion of the commission whether the common carriers shall publish one item, or no item, in those joint tariffs. I call the attention of the House to that section, showing a marked distinction made between through travel with connecting lines transferring freight and passengers under a joint tariff and the case of a single line as specified in section 4.

It appears to me that this act applies only to cases where a railroad or various railroads or lines under a single controlling management go from one State to another, and are therefore brought within the jurisdiction of Congress. And, as I read the bill, so far as long and short hauls are concerned, they are not brought under the fourth section where connecting lines take up freight or passengers going, for instance, from New York to New Orleans, because they are not operated under one management, but each line as a road by itself. And it is provided expressly in the bill that where there is a joint tariff one road shall not be held responsible for the action of another road in the connection.

Now let us see how that operates between two points, such as Chicago and New York. Suppose there is one line from New York to Chicago operated under a single control, a management like the Pennsylvania Railroad, which, I believe, has through communication under its own control. There is also another route or connection between New York and Chicago, but instead of being under one control it is composed of two connecting lines. In the one case the tariff comes under the local tariff provision; it is to be published for the benefit of all concerned, everybody must have access to it; while under the other it comes under the provision of a joint tariff of connecting lines. And, as I understand the fourth section, in one case the commission has jurisdiction, and in the other it has not, although the points of departure and arrival are identical. This and many other inconsistencies could be corrected if further conference is had on the bill.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think the bill unfair to the people in some of its provisions and unfair to the common carriers in others; and I do not believe that a piece of glaring injustice to one party in one section is properly compensated by similar injustice to the other party in another section. And I can not agree with those gentlemen who think that the main thing to be done is to pass an interstate-commerce bill, whatever may be its defects.

When I consider the great benefits which have been realized from the intercourse of trade and travel between different parts of our common country by means of our lines of railroad I would foster and encourage them in every way in the proper discharge of their duties to the public; while I would give to the people every remedy against extortion and unjust discrimination which our courts of justice can afford and which Congress has power to enact. This bill, in my humble judgment, accomplishes neither of these ends; but it proposes instead to clothe five men with the power to make discriminations between common carriers equally as odious and unjust as any of which such carriers have been guilty in their dealings with the public, and it couches the relief which it professes to give against the real grievances of the people in such ambiguous phrases that scarcely any two persons interpret it alike. From it will spring, not relief but long, expensive, and fruitless litigation.

Such will be the inevitable result from the passage of a bill which no one understands, which members who vote for it condemn, and which, in the grant of arbitrary power of suspension of our action to a body of five men, is a confession that we fear the consequences of our own legislation. Better far would it be to confer jurisdiction on the established tribunals of justice, both State and Federal, to hear and determine the complaints of those who have been wronged, according to those well-defined principles of the law of common carriers which the experience of many years has ascertained and illustrated. Surely the courts which can render judgment concerning the life, liberty, and property of the citizen might well be intrusted with the adjudication of his rights as a traveler and a shipper of goods or against a common carrier and of the rights existing between common carriers in their mutual relations with each other.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Whatever time may be remaining I will reserve, as I propose to yield it to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair). The gentleman has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor in order that my vote upon the pending bill may neither be misconstrued nor misunderstood. I am opposed to this bill and shall vote, as my judgment dictates as right, against the bill.

In a former Congress I had the honor to address this House in opposition to the bill upon the question of general policy. I shall here very briefly state my opposition to it from a political view.

If the history of the times is right and if public opinion has not been formed upon imperfect or, perhaps want of, evidence, it was but a few years since that the legal-tender decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States were reversed. Public opinion said that they were reversed by the votes of two judges appointed at the request of certain railway companies. Still later than that public opinion has it that a large amount of "boodle" was furnished to carry a campaign in Indiana as the price of an appointment. I do not say whether public opinion was correct or incorrect; I desire to express no opinion whatever upon that subject, but I do express an opinion thus far on this question, that if Congress assumes control of all the railroad corporations in the United States, Congress masses all the capital of the railway companies and makes it a factor in Federal elections; and if Congress votes for the appointment of persons who are to determine ultimately upon the construction of the law it passes, we force railroad capital into the canvass to secure the election of a man who will bend his knee to their wishes in order to secure their support.

Therefore I regard it as a dangerous exercise of power, and one which, although it may temporarily relieve the people in some respects from injuries and grievances under which they now suffer, will ultimately hang a millstone around their necks by which they will be drowned in the deep sea.

I oppose the bill, sir, secondly, because I am opposed to the fourth section of the bill known as the long and short haul provision. I believe that section is not founded upon business principles, and for that reason it would be unwise legislation. I believe it to be opposed to the interests of my constituents. I believe it to be a deadly blow at the great agricultural interests of the Northwest, and for that reason I oppose it.

I am not to be driven from my position by newspaper articles or by intimidation, for fear of being called an attorney of a railway company. These things have no sort of terror to me. I have prosecuted railway companies for the last thirty-five years in every court in the circuit wherein I live. I oppose it because I believe it to be wrong, as I have said, upon business principles. The merchant who sells a million dollars' worth of goods can sell that quantity at a much less rate per cent. of profit than he who sells but $50,000 worth of goods, and at the same time receive much more remunerative profit from his sales. Why? Because the smaller percentage on the larger amount nets in the aggregate a greater sum than the larger percentage on the smaller amount of sales. So, the railroad company that transports twenty millions of dollars of freight for one community can, for the purpose of securing that transportation, take that freight to market at a reduced rate, much less than it could for the community that furnishes but one million dollars of freight.

The principle to my mind is exactly the same. We of the West are indebted for its immense development, to the rich fields of grain which it raises every year, to its tremendous herds of cattle which are raised there and find their way to market, to the butter and cheese which it produces for export, and very largely to the railways. The energetic intellect which manages the railway systems of the country discovered early that the true way for them to make money was to strike their lines with feeders into every section of the rich Northwest, with its fertile fields; that when the farms were cultivated and the towns and cities grew up it would furnish not only tons by the hundreds for transportation but by the million for carriage to the markets of the country.

Their foresight has proved, at last, to be true in realization; for while there were but about eleven million of tons of freight shipped East from Chicago in 1865, in 1885 there were nearly sixty-six million of tons shipped, and that shipment came from the development of the agricultural fields of the West—Dakota, that furnishes so much wheat, and Minnesota, that furnishes so much flour. When the amount of this export trade is taken into consideration and the railway companies negotiate for the purpose of securing that freight to the seaboard they can make better rates where they are to be furnished with so large a supply of tonnage than they can make with us in Wisconsin, where they will be furnished with a less amount. And so if they have received from us, from Wisconsin, a greater quantity of any article, they can make terms with us better than with Ohio, which will furnish less; and with Ohio they can make better terms than they can make with Pennsylvania. It is a question which can only be solved by the men who deal practically with it day by day.

In addition to this large increase of freight the result is that there has been a reduction of rates in the ratio of four to one, showing that all other sections, besides these sections where these products came from, receive proportionately a reduction in their rates, by reason of the increased business of the transportation companies.

As I said, it is a question that can only be settled by the practical men who handle it and deal with it. It can not be settled by men dreaming and then talking philosophy over it. It can not be settled by newspaper men, who know nothing at all of the problem of transportation; and it can not be settled by legislators who are as ignorant as the newspaper men.

In this identical bill and in this section the conference committee and the Senate of the United States have filed their cognovit that they do not know enough to make the regulations to regulate trade. They have passed the long and the short haul, but they added to it a proviso as follows:

> Provided, however, that upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Here we have, then, Congress making a law prescribing what shall not be done, and in the same breath delegating to a commission in its discretion to nullify its provisions.

This, I say, is a confession of incompetency. It is saying, with a grand flourish to the shippers: We have relieved you from all discrimination, but have provided for the appointment of men who may legalize and authorize the thing forbidden to be done. I do not believe this is sound legislation, or that it will have any other effect than to disturb business, to upturn, for a time, all the freighting interest of the West, increase freights, and reduce the price of all export products. The burden of the law will be borne, like all the other burdens of the Government, by the producer, whom this law pretends to shield and whose interests it pretends to protect.

But, sir, another illustration occurs to me as I am speaking in elaboration of the views before suggested, that the bill was not framed on business principles.

When the grain crops are being moved all of the rolling-stock of the corporation will be in use and be productive. After that comes a period when a portion of it and the working force in connection with it are scarcely earning their wages. Certainly you would hardly expect as low rates as when everything was in use. As business decreases so rates must increase, or the carrier is running at a loss, which no one asks for.

It therefore seems to me, sir, that no law can be passed by us which can properly adjust this great transportation problem. The only law that occurs to me which can deal properly with it is the law of self-interest under certain legislative restrictions which may be imposed without danger.

In what I here have said my reference has been to through freights to the seaboard. In these there may be more or less of discrimination at certain points. There can be no restrictions imposed that will not leave some ground for complaint. Legislation, however, can not be framed upon exceptional cases; it must confine itself to general rules; and while we are studying the problem how to get the product of the grain-fields of the West to the market so that the cost of production and the cost of transportation will not exceed the value of the product when it reaches the market, we must remember that in all governments the individual has to yield measurably his natural rights to constitute an organization that will promote the interest and welfare of the greater number. Society rests upon this principle, and there is no good reason why transportation may not, in a measure, be governed by the same law.

The West and South, more remote from market, may safely have extended to them advantages of shipment, which develop their sections and enrich the whole country, although certain States nearest to markets may not obtain as large profits as they otherwise would but for the competition thus furnished.

The contention here is precisely, in principle, the contention between Pennsylvania and New England with the West and South—high tariff taxation enriches the former and impoverishes the latter, while I contend that a medium is the true rule. The former States must lose some of their profits, because a proper regard for the interests of the other States requires that they shall let up that the remainder of our people may live and prosper.

My belief is that the prohibition against pooling is the true solution of the question so far as we may be able to reach it on through freight, and local State laws guarding against unreasonable and unjust discrimination in the States upon local trade where other principles are involved in the question.

By prohibiting pooling and consolidation of roads, the latter being under State jurisdiction, you create a healthy business competition, controlled by the law of self-interest. The road that is worth what its stock and mortgages represent can carry cheaper, of course, than roads with large issues of stock and large indebtedness exceeding present values. These latter roads, it seems to me, are kept up by pools. Do away with that system and fictitious values must go, and the stock of the road must be re-capitalized upon basis of actual valuation. When that is done I think self-interest will do the rest, and we shall have reached as near as we may the solution of the question. My views may be crude and impracticable, but as I now look at the question they justify my vote.

One word in addition and I have done. What sense is there in having this great commission sit in Washington? Why not make it Florida in the winter and the White Mountains in midsummer? There would be just as much practical sense in such location as to make Washington the central point.

The commission should be where the business to be watched and examined is—where freight is shipped and contracts of shipment are made—I mean by this that the place of location should be upon some point easily accessible, upon the great trunk lines—like Chicago for instance, where all the lines converge and where all the Northwestern lines and the lines from the Pacific coast terminate. There would be some sense in that; but Washington is way at the end of the tail of railroad business. And the place could only have been selected, with a view of having the commissioners near at hand, to be labored with by politicians when Congress is in session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. It would be impossible in the five minutes which the gentleman from New York has kindly yielded to me to discuss the provisions of this biil. I do not expect to discuss them, but simply to state in a few words the reasons why I expect to vote for the bill.

In the Forty-eighth Congress I voted for the commission bill and against the so-called Reagan bill. I thought at that time that as the first step in a new field of legislation the commission bill was the preferable form of legislation. I still believe that for a first step the Senate bill would be the better bill. Nevertheless I have come to the conclusion that I shall vote for this bill simply because I do not expect to have the opportunity in this Congress of voting for any other bill; and I do believe that it will be better for the country to have this bill, with all its faults and with all its uncertainties, than to have no legislation at all upon this great and important subject.

As I said, we are entering upon a new field of legislation as a Federal Legislature. We are about to lay our hands upon the greatest material interest that this country possesses; and that is its internal commerce. The vastness of that interest is measured not by hundreds of millions, but by thousands of millions of dollars annually. Under such circumstances it seems to me that the danger is in attempting too much as a first step. And I fear that this bill attempts too much. When the great commercial bodies of this country in all its great commercial centers are sending up their protests, I think it ought to give us serious reason to pause before taking so long a step as this.

I expect, Mr. Speaker, that this bill, if it becomes a law, will be attended with friction, with loss, and perhaps bankruptcy to some railroads; with some loss to producers by the increased cost of transportation, and more or less confusion in our internal commerce. And yet I intend to vote for the bill because I believe upon the whole, balancing gain against loss, balancing the profit that is to come to the entire people of this country against the loss that will come to particular classes and particular organizations, the balance is on the side of the good and not on the side of the evil.

I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that when we meet again in two years from now we shall be ready, almost all of us, to vote to modify some of the provisions and, if it becomes a law, perhaps to repeal some of the provisions of this bill. I say, frankly, that if I had the power I would strike the fourth section out of the bill entirely. I believe that it will strike the State which I have the honor in part to represent a serious blow, because we depend very largely upon cheap transportation of bulky and weighty products, such as salt, lumber, iron, and copper.

I believe that the long haul and the short haul discrimination as it has been practiced by the railroads of this country is based upon sound business principles. It is the difference between the wholesale and the retail of commerce, and I believe that it is not a discrimination against the people, but, on the contrary, a discrimination in the interest of the great masses of the community who, by means of the long-haul rate, are enabled to dispose of their produce and acquire their necessaries to better advantage. In other words, I believe that the system brings the meat and the bread of the Western producers cheaper to the consumers of the great Atlantic seaboard and returns a larger compensation to the producers of the West and Northwest. Yet, notwithstanding this belief, believing also that this is a bill in the interest of the many as against the few, I expect to give it my vote. I wish it were a better bill, but I despair of a better bill in this Congress, and I shall therefore vote for this one.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, the question of the regulation of interstate commerce has been before Congress for many years, and as yet no action has been taken. The people have been patiently waiting, in expectation that the law-making power would take some steps toward remedying the great evils which have arisen growing out of the manner in which the great corporations have treated the shippers of the country. The people have not expected that a perfect law would be draughted at once, but they have expected that some steps would be taken to insure a remedy. Every attempt at control has been met by the determined opposition of the corporations.

It mattered not whether it was State or National control, the corporations were always on hand with their objections to the proposed plan; these objections presented by the most astute counsel that could be secured. Never in the history of this question have you found the great minds who manage these great enterprises present giving counsel and in good faith assisting the law-making power in formulating a law which would be fair to the people as well as the corporations.

I presume each member of this body has received a score of newspapers containing carefully prepared articles arguing against the proposed legislation, but how many railway presidents and managers have in good faith said a word which was calculated to assist Congress in the framing of a law.

In my own State this question has been before the Legislature for years, and at every session the best talent in the country has been in attendance negativing every proposition looking toward the control of rates on railways. The corporations come before legislative committees, and even obtain the use of legislative halls, where they adroitly pick out the flaws in the proposed legislation, but never attempt to render any assistance in framing a law. The time has come when the people expect legislation. They have heard from the corporations. They have permitted their representatives to make haste slowly in the enactment of a law, but they now demand that a law be passed. Any law that may be enacted will undoubtedly be crude, and will need much amendment before it meets the end in view.

The bill as presented by the conference committee should, in my judgment, be amended in several particulars, but rather than have this session close without some legislation on this great question I shall vote for the bill.

My first criticism to the present bill is that too much is expected of the commission. I am afraid that in its practical workings it will prove a failure and a delusion. It seems to me perfectly idle to suppose that a commission of five men can properly and fairly settle and pass upon the multiplicity of questions arising between shippers and railways on 130,000 miles of railway, extending from Maine to California and from Oregon to Florida. It will, in my judgment, only be a few months before there will be accumulated before this commission hundreds of cases, and that it will be years before the parties will see the settlement of their differences.

Giving parties the right to go into the Federal courts will give a remedy which will be more satisfactory to the people than the commission. The Federal courts are better than no forum at all, but the bill should be so amended as to permit the aggrieved party to go into the State courts, in any county through which the railway runs, and there seek his remedy. Why should a shipper be obliged to enter his complaint at Washington before a commission or seek the expensive Federal court situated perhaps 200 miles from his home? Why not give the State courts jurisdiction and permit a jury of twelve men of the county to decide on the merits of the case?

My own State last winter passed a law compelling foreign corporations doing business in the State of Iowa to incorporate under State law. The people of Iowa believe in having the same forum for corporations as for the people.

The people are jealous of that old-fashioned right of trial by jury. It took the English-speaking people many hundred years to secure that right. It was one of those great rights which they demanded and secured when they wrung from King John the famous Magna Charta. The people will look with suspicion upon any process different from the ordinary courts of the land for the redress of their grievances. The railways have, as a rule, favored the commission, but I find one railway magnate who is fair enough to state that he doubts the efficiency of the commission system. I find that the president of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad, as reported in the New York Tribune of December 19, 1886, says in reference to the commission being capable of handling the question:

> The proposed board of commissioners will, at least for a long time, only aggravate the situation. Five commissioners to examine and decide promptly such delicate, difficult and complicated questions as these! Seventy-five commissioners well trained in the necessary requirements of their positions could not do it. It would require the whole time of five commissioners to hear and pass upon the grievances of this company alone. It would take five for each of the other trunk lines. It would take months of careful and diligent examination to make an intelligent report or reach a wise conclusion.

I believe there is much truth in the foregoing statement. But while the commission may not be effective as a mode of redress there is much that it can do in the way of gathering statistics, making reports, examination of the manner in which railways are conducted which will be of benefit to the people. I could not vote for this bill if the only remedy was through a commission. The courts being open to the people they will furnish to them a forum in accordance with our system of government. And I have faith to believe that jurisdiction will soon be given to State courts in accordance with the demand of the people.

There is much that is good in this bill. It provides that all charges shall be reasonable and just; that discriminating rates shall be prohibited; that no preferences shall be shown; that pooling shall be unlawful; that rates shall be published; that notice shall be given of advance in rates; that no combinations shall be formed to prevent continuous carriage of freights; that these common carriers shall be liable to all damages incurred by party injured. A bill containing such excellent provisions, if passed, will be an indication to the people that the law-making power propose to control these gigantic monopolies which have in the past paid so little respect to the rights of the people. What an indictment could be presented against these railway corporations if time would permit to enter into all the details. Probably 75 per cent. of the railways west of Indiana have not cost the companies a dollar for right of way and road bed. The public has given millions upon millions of the best and most fertile portion of the land to secure their construction.

Not only this, but they have bonded their cities and towns—levied taxes in aid of railway construction until the people groaned under the load. Notwithstanding the liberality of the people, how have they been treated? We find unjust and unreasonable charges have been the rule. That there has been such discrimination between persons and places that men have been driven out of business because they were not the favorites of corporations. That this discrimination has extended to towns and cities to such an extent that in cases where located in the same part of the State of equal advantages and size twenty-five years ago, one has felt the powerful hand of the railway and has been discriminated against while the other has been favored with special rates. To-day one is a thriving city, while the other has been at a stand-still all these years.

The same has been true of the country. We find sections where land is worth sixty and one hundred dollars per acre, the farms are well improved with fine houses and barns, while another section with equal natural advantages is making no progress, and land worth 50 per cent. less, because the one community was favored in rates by the railways, and the other not. The railways have insisted on a rate of exorbitant charges, demanded in order to pay an interest on stock watered in many cases to several times the amount of the original cost of the road.

The corporations said a few years ago the building of rival railroads will settle all questions in the competition which will follow. But we find as soon as competitive lines were built that a system of pooling was inaugurated, and the people were in no better condition than they were with one line.

The railways insisted for years that the public had no right to control their rates. They insisted that as they were quasi public corporations they had, under the power of eminent domain, the right to run a railway where they pleased, it mattered not if the homestead of generations had to be removed, or the remains of the ancestors of the people had to be scattered, in order to secure a road-bed for the railway. And now, when the people say, that, under this same power of eminent domain, we shall control your charges to the extent that they shall be fair, that they shall not discriminate between the people, they should find no fault.

The railway corporations should not expect the people to remain quiet under the exactions imposed upon them. To-day, if you are a resident of Iowa City and desire to buy corn to feed steers, the Chicago and Rock Island Company will inform you if you will buy your corn in Nebraska, and ship it on their road, they will give you a 40 per cent. better rate than they will if you purchase the corn in western Iowa on their line of road. I received a letter from one of my constituents in northeastern Iowa, a few days since, in which he stated that the rate from Council Bluffs to Strawberry Point was 12½ cents per hundred, while from any other point in western or southwestern Iowa it was 20 cents per hundred. This discrimination is to the injury of every one except the dealers in Council Bluffs.

The Central Pacific Railway grants reduced rates to shippers, provided that no part of their shipments shall be transported by water. All are familiar with the anthracite coal combination, the discrimination at Chicago against dressed beef, and the notorious Standard oil combination with the leading railways of the East. The estimated resources of the Standard Oil Company in 1873 was $1,000,000, and now it is said to be $100,000,000. Mr. Cassatt, a member of the Pennsylvania Railway Company, admitted before an investigating committee that in eighteen months the railroads had paid the Standard Oil Company $10,000,000 in rebates. When a monopoly like this can be fostered and sustained in this country by combinations with railways to such an extent that they can increase their resources from one million to one hundred million in fourteen years, it seems to me it is time for the law-making power to take hold of this question with a firm hand.

The people demand equal rights. That railroads shall not charge a low rate to their favorites and a higher to others. Every one knows that it is a common practice at places where the pool is in force for the railway at the end of the year when settlement is made between shipper and railway to give a drawback to the shipper who ships all his produce over the one line. To such an extent is this carried on that in the Western States a man who has no private understanding with railways as to drawbacks cannot successfully compete with his more fortunate competitor in the purchase of produce. An investigating committee appointed by the New York Legislature use five thousand pages in showing the discrminations in that one State, and it was shown to that committee that the books of the New York Central Railway contained over six thousand special rates.

It is said that on account of the discrimination between points that goods can be shipped cheaper from Pittsburgh to Texas by first shipping to New York and then back via Pittsburgh to Texas than to ship direct from Pittsburgh to Texas. Again, a system has been inaugurated by the railways of charging "what the freight will bear." But why particularize further. The country fully understands the power of these corporations—the manner in which they have carried on the business of the country, and the outrages committed by them upon the rights of the people.

The people are making no war upon railways. They do feel, however, as if they should not be considered as common plunder for corporations. They recognize the necessity of railways in this age of progress and advanced civilization. They know that railways have had much to do in the wonderful development of this country during the past twenty-five years; that they are a necessity to the people. Yet they believe the time has come for the public to insist that the right of control of charges shall now be enforced. The fact is there should be a community of interest between the people and railways. They are to a great extent dependent on each other for prosperity, and it is surprising that the men who control railways have not on their own motion taken the initiative in protecting the rights of the people.

The time has come for affirmative action by the law-making power, and while the present bill is not in my judgment complete in providing a remedy for the people, yet I will vote for the bill, believing that action is better than no action, and believing that in the near future the law will be so amended that the rights of the people will be more fully protected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I do not flatter myself that I could add in any degree to what has been said in opposition to this measure. It is true I have my own views of the matter which will be sufficient to govern my own action. But I consider that this matter is practically settled. It has been well said at the other end of the Capitol that this is a bill that, practically, nobody wants and yet everybody will vote for; that, practically, nobody is satisfied with and yet they are all ready to accept it; a bill that no one knows what it means and yet all propose to try the remedy provided therein.

It has been to me somewhat novel and I may say somewhat amusing to see some gentlemen arise here and go on at length, greater or less, to give the reasons why they thought this bill ought not to pass and close their remarks by announcing that they were going to vote for it. Even my friend from Chicago [Mr. DUNHAM], who has stood with the lonely four as the minority on the Commerce Committee, rose here yesterday and stood as the target for all the sharpshooters on the other side, denounced this bill, showed it could not be put in practice successfully in his judgment, in arguments that were quite convincing to me; and then, at the close, he coolly if not gracefully got down on the other side. My friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] said to-day substantially this, that this was a bill which would damage producers, which would damage carriers possibly to the extent of bankruptcy, and which would confuse commerce; and yet in the face of that indictment he said he was going to vote for it.

I am glad that in all this desert there is one bright spot in the person of my plucky little friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], who proposes to nail his flag to the mast and go down with colors flying; and, Mr. Speaker, I propose to go with him.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is another one, you know.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. Yes, sir.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to inflict upon the House any additional remarks. I do not feel that I am competent to enlighten any one, but I shall endeavor to do the best I can in the way of obliging friends by parceling out the remainder of my time, part of it among those gentlemen who do not believe that there is any merit in this bill, but who are, nevertheless, going to vote for it [laughter], and I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROCKWELL].

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, this is not a party but a people's bill. After fourteen years of difference this compromise measure is agreed upon in conference.

While I oppose the fourth and fifth sections and fear their strict execution may cause some injury, yet I find the bill embraces the commission feature. It enunciates the principle that the nation shall control the corporations in the public interest.

Trusting the defects if found to exist will be remedied by future legislation, I shall vote for the measure. The corporations should be the servants of the people, not their masters. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that my friend from New York [Mr. JOHNSON] does not continue his remarks, for from the slight specimen he has given us, I am sure he would add more to the entertainment as well as to the instruction of the House than anybody to whom he could give his time. I do not expect to debate this bill. I had the honor to say something with regard to the question two years ago, which of course is fresh in the minds of the House even at this interval. [Laughter.]

I do not agree in the wholesale denunciation of this bill. I believe that there is a great deal of good in it. I believe that we are not all at sea with regard to it. I believe we desire that most of its provisions shall become law; that our main difficulty is with one—perhaps two—sections; that if we could get rid of the difficulties attending the fourth section, and if we could get rid of the fifth section, there would be, practically, unanimity with regard to the passage of the bill.

I rise, not, as I have said, to debate these questions, but to make a practical suggestion, which is not my own, which has been mentioned to me by others, and it is this: The pending question is not a question upon the passage of the bill. To vote "no" is not to vote against the bill. The pending question is a question of the acceptance of the report of the committee of conference. To vote "no" is to say that we do not concur with the Senate in adopting it. If we do not concur, what is the result? The result is that the matter is still pending before us, and that either this committee of conference will be reappointed, or a new committee of conference will be appointed, and there will then be also the parliamentary right not to instruct that committee, but, at least, to pass a resolution expressing the sense of this House that that committee should re-report the bill with certain amendments. And I admit that the only amendment likely to pass Congress in its present mood is that the fourth section be stricken out—the long and short haul section.

I should like to have the fifth section also stricken out, but I presume that will not be done, and whatever evils the enactment of the fifth section may produce, are evils which we certainly can endure until another meeting of the Legislature. But the evils that are apprehended from the enactment of the fourth section are evils which might go into effect at once, and which could not well wait for the remedies of another session. Now I believe I express the real honest sentiment of more than a majority of this House when I say that if we could have this bill without the fourth section, it would be generally acceptable. It is with reference to the fourth section, its legal effect and meaning, and its effect upon business, that everybody is in doubt and anxiety. It was with reference to the fourth section that the Senator who has been referred to here stated that nobody knew what it meant, and that nobody wanted to vote for the bill but everybody would be, perhaps, compelled to do so.

One word now as to why we should strike out this fourth section. We should strike it out because it is believed to be directly injurious and damaging. In the first place, it is almost impossible to tell what is its legal meaning. No man undertakes to state with certainty what its legal effect will be.

The gentleman who has charge of this bill has very frankly said in substance that if he were a judge on the bench instructing a jury he would be hardly able to tell what is the legal interpretation or effect of the words of this section. This ambiguity may lead to an infinity of lawsuits. If it does nothing else it will lead to great uncertainty in the minds of many as to the intent of the law. It will lead to an injury to those parts of our country situated at the extreme ends of the long haul. My friend at my left has given us an instance where the result must be either the prevention of a great business of exporting anthracite coal to other States, or else a rise in the price of coal, so that farmers who have hitherto been buying it may be unable to do so.

In the second place, that section is objectionable because it puts into the hands of this commission a power of favoritism far more potential than the favoritism of railroads against which you are contending. For these reasons (which I will not enlarge upon, for they have been already enlarged upon) I believe we should all be glad to get rid of that section if we could.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LONG. I ask the gentleman from New York to grant me two minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I will do so.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, there is one reason why I think we may all agree upon striking out the fourth section. It is that strike it out, and no harm at all is done to your bill. The bill will be just as strong without that section as with it. The first section of the bill provides that all rates shall be reasonable; the second section forbids unjust discrimination; the third section provides that any undue or unreasonable preference shall be unlawful; the fourth section provides that not more shall be charged in the aggregate for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, &c. Now to charge more for a shorter than a longer distance is either a reasonable or an unreasonable charge. If it is reasonable, you have provided in this very section that it shall not be prohibited, because you have put in the power of the commission to permit it. If it is unreasonable, then it is prohibited by the first, second, and third sections. So far as it is desirable to prevent unreasonable charges of a larger sum for a shorter than a longer distance, you have prohibited it in these sections. You have thus by these first three sections accomplished all that can be necessary. Hence it is needless to embody in the fourth section an equivalent prohibition, especially when you have there embodied it in language which everybody admits can not be understood, language which, rigorously applied, may result in injury to some sections, and, as everybody concedes, will lead to an indefinite amount of litigation in our courts.

When you have everything that you want in these other sections, and when all admit that this whole bill is tentative legislation; when all admit that we ought to take a step at a time, why not leave out this fourth section? Why not vote to non-concur in this report, with the understanding that the committee shall agree to bring the bill back again with this fourth section left out? In this way, as was well said by the gentleman who made the suggestion to me, you will secure the passage of the bill and no evil will result; the country will be satisfied; and you will have avoided the dangers which are threatened by the measure in its present form. You will have taken the first step, which is the desirable thing to do; you will have preserved the many other provisions of this bill which it is desirable to preserve—the declaration of Federal sanction against wrongful discriminations and unfair rebates; the provision of a commission, which shall have not the power of favoritism, but the power of investigation, the power of recommendation, the power which has been exercised by a similar commission in my own State and many other States with beneficial results.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Is not the rule prescribed in this bill as to the long and the short haul the law in Massachusetts to-day?

Mr. LONG. I think it is, practically. You have, however, changed the words.

Mr. CRISP. But, practically, the law of Massachusetts forbids this discrimination in favor of the long as against the short haul?

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; but we do not have in our charge there the whole interests of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That is a matter, however, into which I do not care to go.

Mr. CRISP. I merely wanted to say that, as I understand, the provision referred to has been put in the bill to meet an idea which seems to exist in the minds of a great many gentlemen—my friend on the right [Mr. SCOTT] and others—that there are cases where, by reason of water competition, the discrimination may be made in favor of the long haul. I understand the provision to be a legislative expression that it can not be reasonable to charge more for a short than for a long haul.

Mr. LONG. I repeat that if the other sections of the bill mean anything, the fourth section is unnecessary. You are as well off without it; and all admit that there are great risks with it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHNSON] for yielding me the remainder of his time; but I desire to say, that if he regards me as one of those who favor this bill in its present form he is entirely mistaken. I could not, consistently with the sentiments, as I understand them, of the people of Alabama, vote for this bill with the fourth and fifth sections remaining in it.

It is well known to members of this House that the State of Alabama is one of the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico—one of the extreme Southern States. Before the war our people lived there quietly, peaceably, contentedly, and happily, with their slaves working for them. But when the war came with its results, slavery was swept away. Then there went into the cotton patch thousands upon thousands of men who before had never done a day's work in the cotton-field in their lives. What is the result? From year to year we have seen the cotton product increasing, not by hundreds or thousands, but actually by millions of bales, until now the quantity of cotton produced in the United States, in connection with that raised in India, is so great that the crop is not remunerative—hardly meets the outlay in making it.

Under these circumstances the people of Alabama turned their attention to the treasures which a bountiful Providence had placed in the bowels of the earth. They began the great work of mining and manufacturing, and to-day the only interests I know of in my State which are prosperous, in which men are growing rich, and which promise to lift the State up and restore it to its former prosperity, are the mining and manufacturing industries of Alabama.

Whether it be a just surmise or not, it is my opinion, sustained as I am by the ablest business men in my State, that to pass this bill, with this fourth section in it, is to dam up the resources of Alabama and obstruct her further progress in mining and manufacturing.

If I had time, I would say something in reference to the provisions about the long and the short hauls. Suppose I take Kansas City, and ask, if a man can expect to carry his products from Kansas City to New York, as cheaply as he could from Saint Louis to that city. Can a man expect to carry his iron or coal as cheaply from Birmingham, Ala., to New York, as from Pittsburgh? Every one knows it is out of the question. It happened, some time ago, that an eminent citizen, then a member of this House, said to me, substantially, that while it is a fact you can make coal and iron cheaper in Birmingham than upon any other spot of American soil, yet all this talk about making Pennsylvanians abandon their plants, or else remove them to Alabama, amounts to nothing, so long as the people of Alabama have to pay such transportation as is necessary to get their products to New York! Just so long as that condition of affairs exists, just so long will Pennsylvania continue her manufacture of iron and will defy your competition.

If that gentleman was right in what he said, I appeal to this House to tell me, will we be in any better condition when we pass a law which will compel the railroads to increase the charges of transportation?

Mr. CRISP. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MARTIN. I have but little time, and cannot afford to yield. I am reliably informed there is 92 per cent. of local business and only 8 per cent. of long-haul business passing over the great Pennsylvania system. Is it to be supposed that great system will reduce its local rates in order to keep the other rates at what they are at the present time. It can not be expected. And what is true of that railroad is true of all railroads throughout the length and breadth of the country. The result will be, you will force the roads to increase the charges for through transportation.

A gentleman of intelligence, on this floor, said to me the other day, that but recently we paid 3½ cents per hundred over through routes per mile. Now he says it is only a fraction of one cent. Where and how did they get the means to enable them to reduce their through rates? Certainly from their local business, and from no other source. Cut off their power to carry their through trade at reduced rates, and what will be the result? You compel them to increase their through rates and deny us, who live on the borders of the country, the right to enter the great mart and emporium of the country to compete with you with the products of our mines and manufactures.

There is one other thought I wish to advance in this connection, which I believe is entitled to consideration. I have submitted it to others, in whose judgment I have implicit confidence, and they tell me there is something in it. It is this: That you will revolutionize the commerce of this country should you pass this bill. Take the illustration I gave a while ago. Suppose a man in Kansas City pays so much for the transportation of his grain, and a man in Saint Louis pays so much less for the shorter haul, does not this thereby fix the price for Kansas City grain in New York city? Can a man in Kansas City get any higher price than a man in Saint Louis? The grain is the same. Can Dakota and other regions come in and compete? I say manifestly not. You do not expect them to enter the market when they know they will get much less for their products than those who happen to live nearer the market.

I thought, Mr. Speaker, with the progress of the present day, we were striving to do away not only with time, but with long distances in this great country, by means of the railroad, the telegraph, and other facilities; and that thereby we would be able to get the people of this country of every section into market on something like equality.

Mr. CRISP. I hope the gentleman's prediction as to a revolution of commerce will come true.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought it was the end and aim of our Government to make our people homogeneous; and to make them, so far as practicable, equal competitors in all the various industries throughout the country. One citizen of a county may live further from its county seat than another; but if the public roads are well-worked, and no restrictions are put upon the trade, the difference in distance amounts, comparatively, to nothing.

We have hoped to see our country one great net-work of railroads, each and all of them making such great speed and carrying freight at such reduced rates that every citizen might enter New York city with his produce as the great county town of the Union.

The bill, I believe, will disappoint all such anticipations, and restore all of the inequalities which have proved so onerous in the past. It will greatly increase the cost of transportation upon all freights for long distances, which must fall, where all such burdens fall, upon the producer.

There is another objection to section 4, to which I invite attention. The section is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Now, if the long and short hauls are under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, then there exists no need for the commission. The protection furnished under the provisions of section 9 giving the party complaining a right to pursue his action "in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction," is ample. If the conditions are not substantially similar, then there is nothing left for the commission to do. The carrier is left free as before. The provision that nothing contained shall "be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance" is without significance as a positive enactment, since the carrier needs no such authority; there is no law against it. I need pursue my objection to section 4 no further.

Section 5 of this conference report is scarcely less objectionable to me. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any other common carrier or carriers for the pooling of freights of different and competing railroads, or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion thereof; and in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

If it were true that the pooling of freights only inured to the benefit of railroad companies and other corporations engaged in transportation, there would be some excuse, if not justification, for this section. It is certainly our duty, in all proper cases, to protect the weak from the strong, the producer from grasping corporations. But the benefits derived from pooling, we should remember, are many and very great. Pooling of freights keeps the railroads from hurrying one another into bankruptcy; for we know that if the "cutting of rates" be kept up for any length of time, bankruptcy would be the inevitable result. But the greatest benefit—and I say it deliberately—is secured to the producer by this pooling of freights. It prevents the unsettling of values in every market affected by it, and secures all the advantages flowing from a healthy competition.

There is another objection which I have to this conference report, and one I can not forego. I am not willing to invest the commission with such extraordinary and dangerous discretionary power. General laws, we know, derive value from their uniform operation, not being the subject of either discretion or caprice. All men may know them, and the construction given them as well, by courts of last resort; and any hardships imposed by them are readily corrected. Not so with this measure, for the discretion given to the commission by section 4 is the most dangerous feature of the bill.

Members of the commission need not accept bribes from the railroad companies in order to grow rich. Having provided himself with a broker on Wall street, a commissioner may speculate in railroad securities upon the result of the official rulings and actions of the commission; for since by a single ruling they may raise or depress the value of the securities of any given line, so by a word to their brokers they may reap the benefit of advance information, and realize not hundreds or thousands, but sums reaching into millions. Such a temptation is both terrible and cruel; and we can find no justification, as I conceive, for creating such a dangerous office. For such reasons, and many others not necessary to recite, I feel it my duty to oppose concurrence in the conference report; and in doing so I believe that I represent the interest and sentiment of the people of Alabama.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I understood the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, in opening the discussion upon this measure, to claim that the power of Congress to pass this bill is based upon or derived from the fact that the railroad companies of this country obtained their charters, their vitality, from this Government.

I wish to call the attention of the House in my opening to the fact that no railroads in this country have obtained their charters from the Government of the United States except the Pacific lines. All the others have obtained their charters from the States through which they run.

The third clause of Article I of the Constitution confers on Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States of the Union. The word "among" is the synonym of between or betwixt; and the power which Congress may exercise is to regulate commerce among, between, or betwixt the States. The thing which Congres may regulate is "commerce," which means trade, traffic, exchange of goods, merchandise, or other commodities. The sixth clause of section 9 of the Constitution declares that "no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another: nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

These fundamental provisions satisfy me that the power conferred on Congress is to make such regulations of commerce between or among the States as to prevent one State from discriminating against the trade or commerce of another—to prevent a State from opposing obstacles to the competition in commerce of the people of another State with its own citizens.

The framers of the Constitution knew that there was danger that State pride and greed of gain would cause, in the course of events, a State to obstruct or burden with taxes the commerce of a sister State for the benefit of its own citizens so as to totally exclude the commerce or trade of such sister State from entering its borders. This would lead to recrimination, and perhaps in some cases to open war. These were the evils which the framers of the Constitution intended Congress should prevent by appropriate legislation. The regulation of commerce between or among the States, as such in their corporate and sovereign capacity, I maintain is the power conferred and not to regulate the terms of shipment between shippers and carriers, which would be a regulation of commerce among citizens rather than among States.

I know that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a State has no power to regulate commerce within its own territory if it were shipped from another State. I regret that such a decision was ever rendered, because it leads to absurd consequences, and while it is persuasive it is not absolutely binding upon the legislative conscience. I know that that court has given vast latitude to the clause of the Constitution from which alone this Congress derives all the power it has to act in this matter. I am fully persuaded that we should not undertake to enlarge our power beyond the vast latitude which that court has declared Congress to possess. In my opinion the bill now under consideration goes further than any of the adjudications has gone.

It is not a bill to regulate interstate commerce, nor is it what it purports to be in its title, a bill to regulate commerce generally. It is in fact a bill to regulate common carriers; and any gentleman who will give it a fair and careful examination will arrive at this conclusion. I think he will have to do violence to its language and force a construction to arrive at a different conclusion.

What right has Congress to regulate common carriers, shippers, and warehousemen beyond that which is necessary to prevent a State from obstructing that commerce which comes from beyond its borders? If Congress has the right to regulate the carriers and their vehicles, then all the ferry-boats engaged in ferrying people and goods across a river from one State to another, and all the stage-coaches, hacks, and wagons, and their drivers, engaged in hauling freights and passengers, wherever they cross a State line, are subject to be regulated and controlled by Congress.

Every huckster or milk wagon which carries fruit or vegetables or milk from Brownsville or Girard, Ala., in my district two hundred yards across the Chattahoochee River to Columbus, in the State of Georgia, from which my distinguished friend comes, is likewise subject to be regulated by Congress, according to the doctrine of this bill, although the vehicle be but a wheelbarrow and the commerce be nothing more than the kolb-jem or rattlesnake watermelons, that are grown in great perfection in that country. If produced in Alabama and transported across the river by some enterprising colored brother, Congress would have the right, according to the principles of this bill, to regulate him, and appoint a commission for that purpose, and make it a penal offense if he charge as much for transporting melons across the upper bridge as the lower one, the one being 50 feet shorter a haul than the other.

Mr. CRISP. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRISP. Does the gentleman regard that man with his wheelbarrow and his rattlesnake watermelons as a common carrier?

Mr. OATES. If he is engaged in that as a business.

Mr. CRISP. It is just there the gentleman's argument fails. It is not the fact that that man is a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce. What a common carrier is the gentleman from Alabama knows; all the elementary works define it.

Mr. OATES. I will meet the question of the gentleman from Georgia there by saying that it does not make any difference whether the carrier be a common carrier or not. It is the commerce which Congress has the right to regulate, and if the method of carrying is involved, in order to enable Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional power, to regulate commerce among the States, it can, as an incident, regulate the carrier, whether he be a common carrier or a private carrier.

Mr. CRISP. Will it interrupt my friend if I were to read, at this point, Chitty's definition of a common carrier?

Mr. OATES. There is no dispute about that. We know what a common carrier is.

Mr. CRISP. I will read Chitty's definition:

A common carrier is defined to be one who by the ancient law held as it were a public office, and was bound to the public, and who to become liable as a common carrier must exercise the business of carrying as a public employment, and must undertake to carry goods for all persons indiscriminately, and hold himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods—for hire as a business, not as a casual occupation.

Carrying rattlesnake watermelons does not come within this definition.

Mr. OATES. That is very true; but the only power you have to regulate common carriers is where it is necessary for the exercise of the power plainly conferred on Congress of regulating commerce among the States. I defy any gentleman to produce any authority in the Constitution for the regulation of common carriers or any other kind of carriers; and I am glad to find the doctrine laid down by the present Supreme Court very broadly, Justice Miller delivering the opinion that the power of Congress must be sought alone in some express grant in the Constitution or be found necessary to carry into effect such powers as are there granted.

That is the rule of construction. Therefore the only power in Congress to regulate carriers, whether they be common or private carriers, is where it is necessary in order to regulate commerce among the States. Your power to regulate a carrier does not depend upon the kind of carrier he is. There is not a word in the Constitution about common carriers, and Congress has no power to regulate them as such.

Now, as I do not wish to consume much time, I will proceed as rapidly as possibly to state the views I wish to present. I concede there are evils in some of the systems of railroad management in this country which call aloud for remedy, and I am willing to stretch our power as far as we can to remedy these evils in behalf of the people. I would open wide the doors of the courts to the injured and provide for their ample compensation for every wrong done them so far as Congress has the power to do it. I know that corporation power has become insolent, and in many instances has been defiant and regardless of individual rights. I know, too, that, in many instances, has it been a potent factor in the legislation and politics of this country. I would stay its conscienceless hand and ward it away from the ballot-box and drive it from the council chamber of the nation had I the power. This bill forces it in here among us. I fear the consequences. We had better "bear those ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

I voted for the Reagan interstate-commerce bill in this Congress and the last, stating at the time that while it contained some objectionable features, yet it contained many good ones; and I would waive the objections because I could see when it was remitted to the courts for adjudication and administration that there would be a fair prospect, if any parts of it operated badly and proved objectionable, to amend or repeal them. But this bill is a very different affair. It remits most of the powers, or a large class of the powers to be exercised over these common carriers and their patrons, to a commission. I do not believe if a commission is once established, however wrong the law may prove in many respects, that it will ever be repealed. I do not believe in commissions; I prefer to have the rights of the people adjudged by the regular constitutional courts and juries of the country.

The history of legislation and the course of administration of this Government prove that whenever an office is created it is never abolished, but rather that those who are appointed to execute it are increased in number if any change whatever be made. Who knows a case to the contrary? Is it not true throughout our history that whenever a salary is affixed to an office, if it is ever interfered with by Congress, the interference is always to increase it, never to diminish it?

I freely confess, sir, that I am jealous of this eternal tendency to the enlargement and centralization of Federal power. To the extent of the legitimate powers conferred upon the Government of the United States by the Constitution, I believe that they should, by fair and impartial laws, have full effect, and be exercised in the interest of the people of this country; but further than that I will never vote to go. Whenever Congress, or any department of this Government, oversteps the clear grants of power in the Constitution, or such implied ones as are necessary to give force and efficacy to the granted ones, so far it is playing the rôle of a usurper, and trampling upon the rights of the people. What does the bill now before the House mean? Why, there are provisions in it which my learned friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] (for whose intellect and whose heart I have as high an opinion as I have for those of any member of this House) is unable to explain. It is conjectural, experimental; and let me say that where such vast interests are involved, dealing as we are with a measure which may produce so much trouble to the business interests of this country, I hesitate to venture. I think we had better legislate to remedy those evils upon which all intelligent and patriotic men are agreed call for a remedy.

I think this a safer course than to launch out in an experiment which may be fraught with untold evils and injuries that no man can now foresee.

This bill, to my mind, enters very largely into a new field of legislation; and it enters it, not like a prudent, sagacious commander who marches into the enemy's country with accurate maps of its topography and knowledge of its resources and of the numbers opposed to him, but like the rash commander who, in the consciousness of his strength, despises the precautions of the wary, and does not even make the ordinary preparations for retreat in case of disaster. I know there be grounds for complaint against certain railroad management, but no such complaints can drive me to vote for a measure fraught, in my judgment, with such uncertainties and probably evil consequences. I am not afraid to vote according to my honest convictions.

The provision in this bill which prohibits pooling may be a wise one, or it may not. I freely confess that I am not competent to pass upon that question. I have no experience in railroad management. I only know that many gentlemen who have had years of experience claim that it is unwise, while others claim that it is wise and right. Therefore, I do not pronounce any judgment whatever on it.

I pass on to another provision of the bill, that which prohibits the railroads from charging more for a short haul than for a longer one over the same or a continuous line of road. I am inclined to believe that this provision will cause through rates to be advanced rather than local rates to be reduced, or perhaps both results may follow, and in either event my constituents and the people of my State will certainly not be benefited, but I believe will be injured by it. If the rates on local freights would be reduced and the rates on through freight remain as at present my people would be benefited. But suppose that local rates remain as at present and that through or long-haul freight rates be advanced to reach equality, the people of Alabama would be injured thereby.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The Reagan bill contained that same provision without any possibility of exception, did it not? And yet you say you voted for that bill.

Mr. OATES. It contained a similar provision to this. That was one of the objections I had to it. I have stated that I voted for that bill notwithstanding I had some objections. I will say to my friend, however, that the objections to it were not half so numerous as are the objections to this bill. In it was a manifest purpose to keep within constitutional power, and to regulate commerce among the States rather than merely to regulate the carriers.

The answer of the advocates of this bill to the criticism upon this provision is to be found in the clause which vests in the commission the power to suspend the law as to any road at any time, and to continue that suspension for any length of time, in the discretion of the commission. In my judgment that provision makes this feature of the bill a great deal worse than if no such proviso were incorporated in it.

I believe that it is absolutely unconstitutional and void, because to my mind it is a blending of the legislative, the judicial, and perhaps, the executive powers of the Government in the same law. That it is legislative is shown by the fact that here is a power of dispensation to be vested in this commission, power to dispense with the law, to suspend it. That is clearly legislative power. Who is to exercise it? It is to be exercised by the tribunal which is charged with the execution of the law, by the same tribunal which is charged with construing the law. In other words, the power of suspending the law is to be vested in the commissioners who are charged with construing the scope of the provisions of this bill, and the powers with which it invests them as well as with the execution of it. All these powers are concentrated in the same body of officers.

Now, if it is not taxing the time of the House too greatly, I desire to read from the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Kilbourn vs. Thompson, in 103 U. S. Report. Let me first read from the syllabus:

6. The Constitution divides the powers of the Government, which it establishes, into the three departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial—and unlimited power is conferred on no department or officer of the Government. It is essential to the successful working of the system that the lines which separate those departments shall be clearly defined and closely followed, and that neither of them shall be permitted to encroach upon the powers exclusively confided to the others.

7. That instrument has marked out, in its three primary articles, the allotment of power to those departments, and no judicial power, except that above mentioned, is conferred on Congress or either branch of it. On the contrary, it declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

The following is the language of the court as expressed by Mr. Justice Miller:

It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all the powers intrusted to Government, whether State or National, are divided into the three grand departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial; that the functions appropriate to each of these branches of Government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to the others, but that each shall, by the law of its creation, be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other. To these general propositions there are, in the Constitution of the United States, some important exceptions. One of these is, that the President is so far made a part of the legislative power, that his assent is required to the enactment of all statutes and resolutions of Congress. This, however, is so only to a limited extent, for a bill may become a law, notwithstanding the refusal of the President to approve it, by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress. So, also, the Senate is made a partaker in the functions of appointing officers and making treaties, which are supposed to be properly executive, by requiring its consent to the appointment of such officers and the ratification of treaties. The Senate also exercises the judicial power of trying impeachments, and the House of preferring articles of impeachment.

In the main, however, that instrument, the model on which are constructed the fundamental laws of the States, has blocked out with singular precision and in bold lines in its three primary articles, the allotment of power to the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the Government. It also remains true, as a general rule, that the powers confided by the Constitution to one of these departments, can not be exercised by another.

It may be said that these are truisms which need no repetition here to give them force. But while the experience of almost a century has in general shown a wise and commendable forbearance in each of these branches from encroachments upon the other it is not to be denied that such attempts have been made, and it is believed not always without success. The increase in the number of States in their population and wealth, and in the amount of power, if not in its nature, to be exercised by the Federal Government, presents powerful and growing temptations to those to whom that exercise is intrusted to overstep the just boundaries of their own department and enter upon the domain of one of the others, or to assume powers not intrusted to either of them.

Now this fourth section is wanting in another essential to constitute it a law. A law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed; it is a rule of action. Here is something which you can not well denominate a rule, because it embodies within it exceptions, not absolute, but only conditional. I read from Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, page 169:

An act of a State Legislature authorizing a party to sell so much of the lands of a deceased person as would be sufficient to raise a given sum, and directing the proceeds to be applied to the extinguishment of certain claims against the estate of the deceased is a judicial act, and as such unconstitutional and void.

In a case where a statute of limitations had run against a demand an act was passed allowing the plaintiff to commence and prosecute his suit in the same way and manner as he might or could have done if the same had been commenced within the time prescribed by law; but the court gave judgment, notwithstanding the law, on the ground that the power of dispensing with the general law in particular cases was not vested in the Legislature.

That was the decision in the case of Holden vs. James Admor, 11 Massachusetts Reports, 396.

I might enlarge upon this point, but I would not be justified in taking time to do so. I will simply say that this clause is not constitutional, is not properly a legislative enactment within the power of Congress, because it proposes to blend legislative, judicial, and executive functions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me inquire of my friend whether Congress can not confer upon these commissioners judicial power, and are not the powers to be exercised under this bill judicial rather than administrative?

Mr. OATES. That is exactly what I maintain—that the power conferred is judicial, and in this clause legislative also; and this being the fact, that part of the bill, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court, would be void.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can the power proposed here to be conferred be anything beyond administrative and judicial power? Do not the provisions of the bill embrace both?

Mr. OATES. That is the very reason it is obnoxious to the constitutional objection—that it does embrace both legislative and judicial power, which can not be blended, because the powers of the Government are distributed, by the Constitution, among three distinct bodies of magistracy, as the gentleman well knows.

Now, there is another objection which I have to this clause. I care not how honest these commissioners may be. They may be as honest as my distinguished friends from Georgia and Texas, who served as conferees; and there are no gentlemen within the circle of my acquaintance whom I believe to be more honest and capable. Yet if I knew that they and such as they were always to be the commissioners without any exception, I would not be willing to intrust them with the powers here proposed to be conferred, for the reason that I am not willing to intrust any man with powers of undefined extent, power which may be perverted and used for unlawful purposes. There is an old adage that "judges should be discouraged from following the crooked cord of discretion rather than the golden mete-wand of the law." Now, look at the probable operation and consequences of this bill. Here is a political commission, because it is declared that not more than three of the commissioners shall belong to the same political party. Therefore the decisions which they render may be political; not that they will necessarily be, but they may be; and it would be an unfortunate thing. It is a bad principle to legislate politics into the judicial system of the Government. The framers of the Constitution endeavored to place the judiciary beyond the baneful influence of partisan politics by giving the judges a life tenure, and yet even this precaution has, I am sorry to say, not always proved successful.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Was not that section incorporated in the bill with the object of eliminating politics from the work of the commission? Was not that the very purpose?

Mr. OATES. That may have been the purpose, but I think it will accomplish just the contrary.

Now let me proceed. Suppose that the temptation were great enough to induce three of these commissioners to exercise this power of discrimination in favor of one competing line of railway against another. Under the provisions of this bill they may relieve one road totally or in part from the operation of the long and short haul provisions—may favor one line and not another. In this way the stocks of one may be sent up in Wall street to a high point, and those of another utterly depressed. Millions could be made in Wall street in a single day by those who are favored with the necessary information.

This section will vest in the commissioners, or rather in three of them, the power to destroy one of any two competing lines of railway upon which this bill will operate.

It is no argument—I say it with due deference to my friend from Georgia—to declare that honest men may be obtained as members of this commission. There were once twelve persons selected for distinguished service because of their supposed fidelity and trustworthiness; yet one of them proved faithless, and we have not in this country's history passed beyond the danger of encountering Judases. I do not propose to vote for a law which is calculated even to tempt honest men into dishonesty. I prefer to follow the spirit of the Lord's prayer—"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Mr. CUTCHEON. Still, this responsibility must rest somewhere.

Mr. OATES. I understand that. I would put the responsibility where it ought to rest—on the properly constituted courts of the country. I would have no commission at all; for I maintain that a commission of even seventy-five members, however astute, could not discharge the duties which this bill proposes to devolve upon five men.

Another suggestion I would make with reference to this clause is this: The most powerful corporation in this country, as I understand, is directly interested in cheap transportation to the seaboard. That is the Standard Oil Company. This bill is so framed as to shut out all competition in oils west of this and the fields of Southern New York and Pennsylvania. It is nearest the seaboard and the great cities. No article "of like kind," in the language of the bill, intervenes. A low rate to a commodity of like kind coming from the west of the locality of the Standard Company would give that company a lower one, because a shorter haul. They will get all of the benefits of the short haul and none of the disadvantages of the long haul, and hence the Standard Oil Company will doubtless be benefited by the passage of this bill.

Pipe lines are not embraced in this bill although carriers of interstate commerce. With cheap rates of transportation—defiant of competition—and the command of the petroleum markets of the world, it seems to me a good measure for the Standard Oil Company. Its domination of the railroads was much complained of in the debates at the other end of this Capitol, but, like Banquo's ghost, it has not downed at their bidding.

Is it not significant that the word "corporation" is omitted from section 2 of this bill?

I ask my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to explain why it is the words "person or persons" are used here, while in all the other sections the word "corporation" is used? I do not understand the reason of it.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman does not mean to be understood that "corporation" would not be included in the word "person?"

Mr. OATES. If so, why is corporation used in other sections?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman would not be understood as saying a corporation is not an artificial person.

Mr. OATES. The use of the word "corporation" should be uniform. That word is omitted from section 2, but appears in section 3 and other portions of the bill. Why this omission? It seems to me that a court in construing this bill as a law would naturally inquire why the Legislature left out the word "corporation" in the second section while it used it in other sections? I do not say there is anything wrong, but I throw out the suggestion as a puzzle to me, and ask my friend to explain it when he makes his reply.

In this connection, however, I wish to call attention to another feature of this bill, the eighteenth section, which I have not time to read. I refer to the section which provides for the compensation of these commissioners, and in the latter part invests them with power to employ all such agents and assistants as they may find necessary to enable them to carry out the objects and purposes of this measure and to fix their compensation, which no doubt would always be liberal. Most men are far more liberal with other people's money than they are in the expenditure of their own.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And to fix the salaries of those agents and assistants.

Mr. OATES. Certainly, to fix their compensation, subject only to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The salaries of the commissioners, $7,500 a year each, and the salary of their secretary, $3,500 a year, and their traveling expenses, are a mere bagatelle, amounting to nothing compared with the other expenses which will be incurred by the commission. They have the power to subpœna witnesses from any part of the country, from the most remote portion of the Pacific Coast, and bring them to Washington, and those witnesses are entitled to the same compensation as witnesses subpœnaed to appear in United States courts.

The Government stands the expense all the way through. What number may be subpœnaed is left to the discretion of the commission. The number of assistants they may employ is not fixed, nor are the cases in which they may employ assistants defined. They may employ a thousand lawyers all over the country and fix their compensation at the very highest rates known to the profession.

They may give one hundred fat places to as many of the relatives of each commissioner and not violate any provision of the law. The veto power which the bill gives to the Secretary of the Interior is an inadequate safeguard to the Treasury. He, however honest and capable, and no one questions these in the present most highly efficient Secretary, would very naturally avoid so far as he could disapproving accounts rendered by the commissioners for services which they would certify to be worth the amount charged to the Government.

I now invite the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to the twentieth section of this bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 20 That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipment; the number of employés and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts with other common carriers, as the commission may require; and the said commission may, within its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe (if in the opinion of the commission it is practicable to prescribe such uniformity and methods of keeping accounts) a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

It requires all the railroads which come under the provisions of the bill to make annual reports as to the amount of stock, the names of the stockholders, the shares held by each, and everything pertaining to their business.

In one clause of this section the commissioners are instructed to adopt, as early as practicable, one uniform system of book-keeping for all the railroad companies.

Mr. CRISP. Perhaps that is hardly a fair quotation—the language is "if practicable."

Mr. OATES. As soon as practicable. That is, in addition to the other powers to be vested in the commission. They are not only to be legislators, judges, and executors, but this provision attempts to make them school teachers also.

When you come to apply that twentieth section to the railroad corporations who obtained their franchises from the States through which they run, to compel them to render an account of their stockholders and the profit of their business, suppose they refuse to do it? The commission apply to the United States court to compel a compliance. Would such court enforce obedience to requirements of that section? What power is there? What sort of instrumentality for the regulation of commerce among the States is this disclosure of the private affairs of a State corporation? Is it an appropriate and necessary means? Is it fitting and proper to enable Congress to carry out that provision of the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States? I deny it; and if I had time to read from the decisions of the Supreme Court I would show clearly where they say that under no such assumed power can Congress institute inquiries into the private affairs of the citizen.

That provision in this bill, it strikes me, is intended for the gathering of statistics upon which future legislation may be based. It is looking to a consolidation or centralization of power in the Federal Government, which is, to me, startling in the extreme.

Dr. Franklin said upon the subject of governmental interference with private rights: "It would be better if Government meddled no further with the trade and traffic of the country than to protect, and let it take its course. The statutes, acts, edicts, arrets, and placards of legislatures, parliaments, princes and states for regulating and directing trade and commerce, have been political blunders or jobs by artful men designed for private advantage under the specious pretense of public good."

It is far-reaching in the direction of the centralization of power Why, gentlemen, how inadequate, how utterly unable, if we were to sit from one end of the year to the other, is the Congress of the United States now to deal with and pass upon all of the questions that are lugged in here by the thousands and tens of thousands of bills which are introduced in every Congress, and yet by this bill you would open the door wide into a new field of legislation which in itself would be enough to occupy the entire time of Congress at each session. It is a vast and unexplored field, and I must respectfully decline your invitation to enter it, so far as I am individually concerned. I believe by opposing this measure I am rendering the best service possible to my constituents, my party, and my country. My conviction of duty requires me to raise my voice against it, although I know I can not defeat it.

It will lead, I apprehend, to other legislation to lay a predicate for which the information required by the twentieth section is needed, and railroad corporations are at once forced to abandon freight and passenger pooling and to engage in political pooling. The reports would be used as a predicate for legislation to make the earnings of all the railroads of this country uniform. When Congress does this capital will seek other investments than railroad building, which is just at this time doing so much for the people of my State.

This bill is a long stride in the direction of paternal government, for by that theory this Government must protect and direct the business of all of the people of this country, and leave nothing to that independence and manhood which has distinguished Americans above the people of every other country on the face of the earth.

When a man starts out in life, if his father remains his guardian and he can not engage in any enterprise except such as his father suggests, and in which he has his father to lean upon, when he reaches thirty or forty years of age he will not be a man, but a boy still. But throw him upon his own individual responsibility, let him fight for his own principles without any intervention on the part of others, let him fight the world alone and be the architect of his own fortune, and it brings to the surface all of the manhood that is in him, and develops that distinctive American characteristic of which we are all justly proud. And, Mr. Speaker, from this individual instance of the development of manhood, which extends to our whole people and characterizes them as a nation, it leads me to protest against the interposition of the General Government in an assumption to control all of the affairs of the people.

It should only interpose where necessary in order that great abuses may be prevented and justice administered among the people. The administration of justice between man and man, and the maintenance of good order, is all the business of Government. Further than that it should never, in my judgment, undertake to go. It should leave every man as much of his native freedom as is consistent with these two purposes of the Government.

This bill is not a measure limited to the correction of well-known evils. It will force every railroad corporation in the country into politics. It is a gigantic stride toward paternal government. It is fraught with untold dangers. I will not look too closely least I should see the appalling shadow behind a vast centralization of approaching monarchy. In Holland it is a capital felony to kill a stork, because the stork destroys the eels which bore through the dikes and inundate the country. To my mind this bill is a knot of eels which may bore through the dikes of safety and flood this country with trouble. I view it with grave apprehension.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has thirteen minutes.

Mr. OATES. I yield that time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] half of the time given to me.

Mr. OATES. I also yield to the gentleman from Maryland five minutes of the time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL], which he placed at my disposal.

Mr. FINDLAY. I am half inclined to vote for this bill, because on a fair comparison of its merits with its defects there would seem to be a balance of merit in its favor, but in conceding this I am not to be understood as underestimating the very grievous fault which I think is embodied in what is known as the long and short haul clause of the bill; a fault not merely accidental, but in its very nature essential, radical, and incurable. This clause does not absolutely prohibit a discrimination in rates in the transportation of either passengers or property, but proposes to confine the prohibition to a case where the circumstances and conditions are substantially similar, and even narrows down this prohibition by allowing exceptions to be determined in the discretion of the commission.

It is obvious, then, upon the face of the clause that in the opinion of its authors there are some things beyond the scope of legislation, some conditions not within the corrigible power of the law, and, however humiliating or mortifying the confession, that there are limitations even upon the omnipotence of an American Congress. If it had been possible to prescribe absolute uniformity by providing that in no case should there be a greater charge for a shorter than a longer distance, then it is not necessary to say that the opportunity would have been eagerly seized, and instead of discussing a conditional prohibition frittered away to the point of harmless tenuity by disretionary exceptions, we would have been called upon to deal with an iron-clad and inflexible rule of exclusion.

We start out, then, with an admission that it is only in cases where there is an identity, or substantial identity, in conditions and circumstances that the long and the short haul shippers or travelers shall be placed upon the same level of equality, and that even when such a parity of condition exists the rule against discrimination may be relaxed in the discretion of the five gentlemen who are to administer this law. I do not know how it strikes others, but it seems to me that it is a giving away of the whole case, not a willing or a voluntary surrender, but a simple submission to the inevitable. It is an admission that the conditions and circumstances surrounding a short and long haul may be very different; and even when they are apparently alike, there may be strong points of essential dissimilarity which would make the enforcement of a uniform rule as to rates oppressive and unjust. Reading the clause in the light of this admission we start out with a strong presumption against the feasability of any legislation whatever upon the subject; and when we come to examine the conditions under which the rule is to be enforced we will find this presumption immensely strengthened.

Discrimination is legal in favor of a long as against a short haul in every case—so reads the section—except where the circumstances and conditions of the travel or the traffic are substantially similar, not apparently similar, but substantially so, or as I read it, where the equities of each particular case are the same. Now let us take an illustration. The Boston, Hoosac Tunnel and Western Railway Company is an interstate road between Mechanicsville, N. Y., and North Adams, Mass. It has Western connections reaching, I do not know how far; but for purposes of illustration I will assume to Bismarck, Dakota. A car-load of grain is shipped at this point for export at Boston, and in getting there must pass over the portion of the road between Mechanicsville and North Adams. It does so without the loading or the unloading of the grain at either of these points, and passes on to Boston without any intermediate station service.

The same day the car passes over the road a local shipper at Mechanicsville sends to North Adams (an interstate point) a car of potatoes, which of course has to be loaded at the point of departure and unloaded at the point of destination; in other words, requiring two station services before the shipment is completed. Now, then, you have the case of a long and a short interstate haul, and it is perfectly clear that the conditions and circumstances are not the same or substantially similar, and would not fall within the purview of this clause.

Take the case of a shipment of lumber from Grafton to Cumberland and from Grafton to Baltimore inter-state points on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; suppose the shippers send the same kind and the same quantity of lumber in a given time, say a year, the one to Cumberland and the other to Baltimore. Here the conditions would seem to be substantially similar, and the rule could be made to apply. But suppose the Baltimore shipper happens to be largely interested in the transportation of cattle to Liverpool, and says to the Baltimore and Ohio Company, "I will ship over your road to Baltimore, provided you make me some concession as to lumber shipped from Grafton; and if you do not, I will send all my cattle either to New York or Philadelphia." The company must either accept the offer or lose the business, both for itself and Baltimore. It accepts, and makes a rate on lumber to Baltimore which in itself will not pay even for the carriage of the same article to Cumberland; and then the Cumberland shipper from Grafton demands the same rate for his lumber.

Is he to get it? If he is charged a reasonable rate, or the same rate every other shipper is charged from Grafton to Cumberland, upon what equity can he plead and claim the benefit of a rate which a non-competitor gets for a longer haul in consideration of bringing other and more lucrative business to the road? A provision that all shippers from the same point of departure to the same point of destination should be charged the same rate for a similar service would be just; but a requirement that all shippers over the same route to different points of destination, some for a shorter and some for a longer distance, shall have the benefit of equal rates is the worst form of discrimination in favor of one class as against another.

But, referring to my last illustration, could it be held that the circumstances and conditions of these two Grafton shippers of lumber, one to Cumberland and the other to Baltimore, the one controlling a different class of freights from other points and the other none, would the case fall within the scope of this clause? I think not. All the shipper to Cumberland would have a right to demand would be that the rate charged him should be reasonable; but if it were it makes no difference as far as he is concerned what is charged to another man shipping to a different point and where business does not come into competition with his own. The whole scope and design of this act is to make the charge reasonable; and when I read in the fourth section "that it shall be unlawful to charge," &c., "subject to the provisions of this act," I interpret this language as meaning that the discrimination prohibited is an unreasonable discrimination. I submit in the case put that the discrimination would not be unreasonable, and that the courts would so hold.

Now, I ask whether in the nature of things there is not an inherent difference between the conditions of a short and long haul, and if there is it follows that the clause which requires these conditions to be substantially similar can never take effect. I am almost prepared to affirm that there will not be a case under this section where the long-haul will not be able to establish a superior equity of some kind against the short-haul shipper, and where he will not get the benefit of it either through the courts or the commission.

Another grave objection to the clause is the power of the commission; and still another arises out of the advantage an infrastate railroad will have over an interstate. The distance from Philadelphia to the Ohio River by the Pennsylvania Railroad is about the same as the distance of Baltimore by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to the same river; but the Pennsylvania Railroad in traversing this distance crosses but one State, and the Baltimore and Ohio passes through three.

If one is to be placed as to charges under the provisions of this bill and the other is to be regulated by the State, it is not difficult to see what an enormous advantage the Pennsylvania Railroad would enjoy. I have no time to amplify this or the objection to the power of the commission, but having spoken very fully on the subject of freight discriminations at the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, I bid farewell to the subject, leaving to time, the only true prophet, to determine what is good and what is bad in the measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield what remains of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, authority is given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States. Such regulation, presumably, is always to be in the interest of commerce. The end of any regulation, therefore, is to secure conformity to certain equitable principles which long experience has shown to be essential to prosperous commerce everywhere.

These fundamental principles, recognized everywhere as equitable, just and necessary, are: 1. Reasonable rates or charges; 2. No unjust discriminations; 3. Proper and equal facilities to all.

In-so-far as this bill is calculated to secure the enforcement of these principles it will receive, doubtless, general approval. Experiments beyond the enforcement of these principles may well be looked upon with apprehension.

Possibly, in some respects, the bill before us goes too far; possibly, in others, not far enough. There are some features of the bill that I do not like; others that I am in doubt about. It may take experience to demonstrate the wisdom or unwisdom of many features of the bill.

A perfect law on such a matter as this is hardly to be expected at the outset, and changes may become necessary—very likely will. Nevertheless, as the bill can not be amended, and must be taken as a whole or not at all, I shall vote for it as the best which, under the circumstances, can be obtained, believing that the time has come for the Federal Government to assume that regulation of commerce among the States contemplated in the Constitution and for which States are inadequate.

In answer to criticisms on the long and short haul clause, I desire to say I would like myself to strike out the "substantially similar" phrase, but the long and short haul principle, as a rule, is thoroughly sound. The controlling element that enters into the determination of the question of the reasonableness of a charge is the value of the service, and it never can cost more or be worth more to move a train over a part of a road in the same direction and at the same time than to move it over the whole road, and upon this fact the rule is founded.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix].

HIATT AND COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. MCMILLIN] laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 7th ultimo, from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draught of a bill "for the relief of Hiatt & Co., late traders for the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes." The matter is presented for the consideration of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 18, 1887.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORROW. I take the floor, and will resume it after the recess. The gentleman to whom I was about to surrender the floor has left the Hall.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

Mr. DUNN. Before the question is taken upon that motion I wish to say that I understand distinctly that under the order of the House no business is in order at the evening session, even by unanimous consent, except to continue this debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the order of the House this morning.

The motion of Mr. STEELE was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at 7.30 p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is in session this evening under the special order made to-day for debate only on the interstate-commerce bill. The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORROW. Having sought the floor under the impression that I would be able to take part in a more extended discussion of this question than I will be at liberty to do under the limitation now placed on the debate, I will not detain the House with any discussion of the merits of this bill. I can not allow the opportunity to pass, however, without entering a protest against the provisions of section 4, concerning long and short hauls. Representing as I do, in part, the city of San Francisco, the initial or terminal point of nearly all the transcontinental traffic, I would be derelict in my duty if I did not say that from the debate we have had in this House and the debate that has been had in the Senate it appears definitely determined that this provision of the bill, if effective at all, is inimical to the commercial interests of the people of the Pacific Coast, located as they are at the end of an ultimate long haul.

I am decidedly in favor of most of the provisions of this bill, and I should be glad to support them under such circumstances as would secure the benefit of their controlling provisions without ingrafting upon the law section 4. I agree with several gentlemen who have addressed the House that it will be possible for Congress before adjournment to enact the other provisions of the bill into law in such shape as to afford to the country that protection which is necessary in the matter of the control of railroad corporations, at the same time omitting this provision which, it seems to me, is detrimental to those sections of the country which are located at distant points and across the continent.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. MORROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Is it not the fact that living on the shores of the Pacific, the gentleman from California represents a constituency which would come under the exceptions provided for in the bill—the dissimilarity suggested in the bill?

Mr. MORROW. I have listened to this debate very attentively, and all I am able to make out of it is that if this provision is of any force as a measure of control it is against the interest of the people I represent, and I do not think it wise to remit California and the Pacific Coast to the doubtful provisions of an exception to the general law. Let the statute be specific and definite, and we will abide by its directions. I yield the rest of my time to my colleague from California [Mr. MCKENNA].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] is entitled to six minutes.

Mr. MCKENNA. I thank my colleague for his kindness. It would seem an idle thing at this time and stage of the debate to say anything about the pending measure. But, sir, my purpose in rising is not entirely idle. I received this morning a telegram from a portion of my constituents, which I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., January 19, 1887.

Hon. JOSEPH MCKENNA,
House of Representatives, Washington:

Board of Trade mails you to-night resolutions adverse to long and short haul clause of interstate-commerce bill.

JOSEPH STEFFENS.

Mr. MCKENNA. Now, sir, in reply to the request of my constituents and rising as my colleague did to protest against some of the provisions of this bill, I wish to say in advance I have no doubt of the competency of Congress to regulate interstate commerce and no doubt of the policy of doing so if it be done by a carefully prepared, intelligent, well adapted, and well measured law, and I therefore sympathize with the primary purpose of the bill reported by the committee and concur in many of the means by which it is sought to be accomplished. But the provisions of the fourth section, I think, are so detrimental to the interests of the State which I have the honor in part to represent that I can not consent to the passage of a bill at least without some protest against that clause in the hope that those who succeed us will have industry and intelligence and wisdom enough to correct its manifest mischiefs.

I know, sir, that legislation must be practical, and that no law can be expected to express universal opinion.

But, Mr. Speaker, the peculiar and significant and warning diversity of interpretation of the fourth section should give us pause before we enact it into rigid and imperative law. Why, what is our situation? The members of the committee on the part of the House were intended to represent its views, and were expected to understand what they assented to, and to report that understanding to the House. We had a right to expect that all members of a free conference between the two great Houses of legislation should agree to the same thing in the same sense, and report that agreement to the House, to have a clear understanding of their purpose and discernment of its effect. Their counsel would be valueless else—their report of no service. We know what the opinion of the Senate committee is, although by a kind of legislative humbuggery I dare not refer to it. We do not know the opinions of the House committee. The report contains no comment, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] was very careful to say that he expressed no one's views but his own.

The House is entitled to more than this. Before it can be called upon to assent or dissent from the report of a committee it should understand what the report means. Law-makers, Mr. Speaker, should know what they are about; they should have unity of purpose, and that purpose should be declared in unambiguous language, not in words and phrases so equivocal that they are ambushed by all sorts of meanings and mischiefs. Why, sir, if the language of a distinguished gentleman, spoken elsewhere and which has already been quoted by others, that this bill is one no one wants or is satisfied with or knows its meaning, but all are going to vote for, be not rhetorical exaggeration if it correctly describe our relations and feelings to this bill, even if there be demand for legislation, as no doubt there is, this bill will not satisfy the demand.

It is subserviency, not obedience, to the people; and obedience, intelligent, deliberate, and useful is what is desired. Another has said that a Representative's constituents are "entitled not only to his industry but to his judgment." If either is denied, his obligations are not fulfilled; compliance otherwise is servility, not service, and a servility as abject as it is useless. Of course it may be said that in these various diversities of interpretation each may adopt his own dogma, and hope that his view may prove correct. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia is an intelligent and fair man, and a friend of the purposes of this bill; and it would not be safe to say that his interpretation is not correct. If it is correct, then, in my judgment, as I have already said, this bill is injurious to the State which I represent.

Now, what is our situation? We have, extending to the State of California, four or five lines of railroad. We have the Southern Pacific and its connections; we have the Atlantic Pacific and its connections; we have the Central and the Union Pacific, with their connections; we have the Northern Pacific and its connections; and we have water competition by way of the Pacific Ocean, the Isthmus, and the Atlantic. We have the competition of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, a railroad largely subsidized by the English Government, which has guaranteed $60,000,000 of its stock at 3 per cent. The purpose of that road is to convey to English cities, to English territory, and to English capital the trade of Japan, China, Australia, and the islands of the Pacific Ocean, as against California and American cities.

I believe, sir, the bill will take from California some of the benefits it now enjoys from the overland routes. Its advantages are naturally derived, and it is unjust to take them away and confer them elsewhere by artificial regulation.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I object to the fourth section of the bill. The section has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] as absolutely unnecessary. Other provisions of the bill confer upon the commissioners ample power; and if they be fit to have those powers conferred upon them, if they have any adequate notion of the proper discharge of the functions which they are intended to exercise, they could surely correct all the evils sought to be corrected by the fourth section if to charge more for a short haul than a longer be unjust to persons or places.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without consuming further time, I will only say that on the grounds I have stated I feel constrained to protest against the fourth section.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which, after vigorous effort I have been able to obtain, but little can be said. It is alleged that there are between seven and eight thousand millions of dollars invested in the capital stock and indebtedness of the great railway system of the United States. That system is under the control of a very limited number of individuals, and has the power, and last year exercised the power, of collecting from the people of the United States $756,000,000, some two or three times as much money as that collected by the Government of the United States. For many years these men have been beyond all control, except the general "cussedness" of themselves. [Laughter.] There has been no law governing them; there has been no law, either written or unwritten, which they respect. The simple question with them has been at all times how much money they could extort from the people by passenger and freight rates. After a struggle of more than a decade Congress is now on the point of enacting a law, saying to these men as common carriers having exclusive use of public property, in the form of public highways, "you shall charge hereafter only reasonable rates," and the other provisions incorporated in this bill to control them.

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have the greatest single interest of the land here involved. Generally these roads are owned east of the Alleghany Mountains, and I think the record will show the fact that every Senator from New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, except one, voted for the recommittal of the bill, which was the test vote in the Senate. Eastern parties owning the railway property have, of course, the interest of collecting just as much money from it as they can collect. Who pays this? The people of the United States. This afternoon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in the course of the discussion said that the question before us was whether you would put the 130,000 miles of railroads in this country under the control of five commissioners; and yet he seems to have hardly stated the question fairly. The real question is whether the United States Government shall put itself, by law and through its courts and commission, between the people of the United States and the rapacity of these, in many instances, irresponsible pirates.

Of course where there is such a vast interest at stake there will be coequal opposition. Here is a power which controls State Legislatures, for it is a mere matter of history that that most unmitigated scoundrel Jay Gould did control the Legislature of New York in the Erie case; and everybody knows that in every State of the Union the railroad companies have attempted to control State legislation, and to control the election of members to this floor; and, I may say it under the rule, nobody doubts the fact that in the next Senate there will be many Senators who will have been elected by the railroad power of the land. And so I repeat that when Congress comes to legislate against this power we must meet the most vigorous opposition possible for the ablest minds to present.

Well, we are attempting to do that to-night. Here we have an agreed bill, and I congratulate the conferees on the part of the House on gaining the many important features they have gained—far more than any one expected. I did not believe the Senate would yield half as much as it has yielded. This bill prohibits discrimination in rates. It makes illegal the building up of individuals or of places at the expense of other individuals or places. It prohibits pooling; it prohibits rebates; it requires publicity of rates; and it says that more shall not be charged for a long than for a short haul in the same direction over the same line and under substantially similar circumstances. Now we all know that for years the railroad lobbyists about this Hall have proclaimed at all times that the latter provision would be detrimental to the West. I deny it in toto. There is not a solitary syllable in this bill which says or requires that the roads shall raise their long-haul rates. Everything that has been said to this effect in the discussion of this clause has been a matter of mere inference.

It is stated that these roads must make a given sum of money. How will they do it? Why, in 1885, according to Mr. Poor, who is the best statistician upon this subject, they were making about 9 per cent., I think, on their property, and, as some gentlemen will of course deny that, I ask the liberty to incorporate his language at this point in my remarks, as cited by another. It is as follows:

Mr. Poor, the highest authority on railroad statistics, said that the actual cost in money of all the railroads in the United States in 1883 did not exceed their funded and floating debts, an aggregate of $3,787,000,000, and that the fictitious capitalization was $3,708,000,000. This is his language:

"If it be assumed that the cost in money of all the roads in operation in the United States in 1883 did not exceed, as it certainly did not, the amount of their funded and floating debts, $3,787,410,728, the actual investment was a most profitable one. The net earnings for the year were $336,911,884, a sum equaling about 9 per cent. on their cost. If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success, as investments, would have no parallel.

"It is in this immense increase of fictitious capital that is to be found the cause of the general distress which prevails, and the enormous decline in the price of railroad securities. From 1879 to near the close of 1883 a most singular delusion rested upon the public as to their value, and this delusion was taken advantage of on a vast scale by able and unscrupulous adventurers. Whatever was manufactured and put afloat was seized with avidity by an eager and uninformed public. The delusion was increased and prolonged by payments on a very large scale of interest and dividends from capital. In this delusion the most loud-mouthed and unscrupulous promoters usually had the greatest success."

Mr. Adams—and no one will question the veracity of his statements—before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, said that the investments the Union Pacific road had made in its branches had yielded between 10 and 11 per cent. annually. The allegation of the railroads now is that to make the amount of money they are to-day making they can not reduce the local rates, but must increase the longer rates. It is an inference throughout. There is no telling what in their greed they will do, whether controlled by some such legislation as this bill provides or not. But is not the true question, whether they are not now making a greater interest than is fair to the people, and whether both through and local rates ought not to be reduced?

They have the power to increase the long-haul rates now. They exercise it whenever they please, and the only thing which keeps them from exercising it is competition. That is all. And in seeking to prevent pooling you seek to secure competition. I doubt very much whether they will raise rates, because this bill will not take effect until about the 1st day of April, and navigation will open about that time; and it is lake navigation which regulates your through freights, so far as the West and South are concerned. It is not the grace or benevolence of railroad managers. There is an association of general freight agents, an Ananias club, who profess to give vastly lesser rates than they can really afford, but no one believes them. They take just all they can get; and when lake navigation is open you will find precisely the competitive forces operating which operated before. And it is this competition which, in my judgment, will prevent the disastrous results of higher through rates which so many gentlemen see before them if this bill shall become a law.

This bill is not perfect. There are many things in it which I wish were out, and many things out which I wish were in. But I rejoice in the consciousness that the Fiftieth Congress will come after this one, and the Fifty-first after that one; and that these objectious to the bill can be removed. Can not the next Congress amend the law? If these commissioners should be partisans, as urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], can not the commission be knocked out of the law. I would like to see that whole provision eliminated. As a usual proposition, a railroad commission is controlled by the railroads sooner or later. And if there be any other feature in the bill that is imperfect may not the next Congress amend it? Certainly.

It seems to me—it may not so seem to the gentlemen who make the objections—but it seems to my mind that the objections urged are purely of a temporary character and exceedingly trivial, and that any imperfections of the kind which have been suggested can be remedied by the next Congress. I therefore congratulate the people that at last the American Congress proposes to enter upon the work of protecting the people against the rapacity and ruthlessness of railroad companies, and for that reason I shall support the bill, claiming the right in the future to endeavor to secure amendment wherever that amendment shall be needed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ROWELL Mr. Speaker, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution the power to regulate interstate commerce has existed in Congress.

For fifteen years at both ends of this Capitol attempts to pass into law some act of this kind have been continually made, and every attempt has met with such criticism of the provisions of the particular bill, as we have heard during the discussion of this measure, submitted to us by the conference. It is a source of wonder to me why some of these wise critics, who know so well how to tear down, have not, before now, learned how to build up so as to present a bill not subject to the criticisms which they make. Such skill in exposing the ignorance of others, in giving expression to their ideas, ought not to be lost to the country in this emergency, but ought to be turned into good account in draughting something that could be understood.

If these gentlemen will examine their own minds and the motive which prompts their criticisms, they may possibly discover that in their judgment all legislation in the interest of controlling or regulating this business of interstate commerce is unwise legislation; that their criticisms of the various provisions of this bill are criticisms which they would aim at any attempt at legislation on this subject, the purpose being to show, not the inconsistencies of the several sections of the pending measure, but the impropriety and inexpediency of legislating at all upon the subject. I recollect a day or two ago my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] asked for an example of what would be "substantially similar circumstances and conditions" as that expression is used in section 4, and when the gentleman in charge of the bill declined to have plain language confused by a discussion of what particular fact would come within it, it was held up as a conclusive showing of the uncertainty of the meaning.

I suppose when my friend was Commissioner of Patents he had no difficulty in understanding the meaning of the patent law as to when a patent might legally issue, but at the same time it was no doubt true that in hundreds of instances he found a good deal of difficulty in determining whether the things sought to be patented came within the law. And that illustrates one-half the criticisms aimed at section 4, and other sections of the bill.

The difficulty is not so much in the meaning of the language. The difficulty suggested is: Whether or not this or that fact, or combination of facts, will bring a case within the operation of the provision. If, in order to understand the law, we are to wait until we can tell whether the court will hold that evidence is sufficient to establish a right under it, then there are few legal definitions which have a definite meaning.

This whole discussion has been filled up with examples of language criticism, intended ostensibly to show that the bill has been carelessly drawn and is full of uncertainties, but which are really efforts to make it appear that all legislation in this direction is unwise, while seeming not to oppose proper measures for the correction of admitted evils.

As an example of some of the criticisms, let me call attention to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE], who today undertook to criticise the bill for uncertainty, because, as he said, the individual, while apparently allowed a choice of remedies either to prosecute his claim through the commissioners or by suit in the courts, was in reality barred from his individual remedy, that the commissioners might take up his case without complaint, without notice to him, and thereby bind him to accept such nominal damages as they might award without his having made any application and without an opportunity to be heard. And this in face of the fact that section 9 in express terms gives choice of remedies, and of the universal law that an individual can not be bound by a proceeding affecting his personal rights unless he has had an opportunity to be heard. His criticism amounts to a claim that Congress has power to take away an individual right without the privilege of an individual hearing.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], who would not tolerate the suspicion that he is not an extreme advocate of legislative control over the "grasping monopolies," finds such objection to the commission feature of this bill that he will vote against it, and so extend the time for them to remain "grasping monopolies;" and one of his objections rests on the claim that the commissioners are, by the bill, obliged to be partisan. And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], at the other extreme, reiterates the sentiment, and finally the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] brings up the reserves and clinches the objection—and what is this objection based upon? Simply this, that the bill provides that not more than three of the commissioners shall belong to one political party, instead of permitting all five of them to be of one political faith. Why, gentlemen, every man worthy of responsible trust in this country is a partisan. He can not escape it if he is capable of having a conviction or is competent to form an opinion.

If to provide that all of the commissioners shall not be of one political party makes that a partisan board which otherwise would not be, then the objection might amount to something; but if the provision takes away exclusive partisanship in one political direction and divides responsibility, then it accomplishes the very object that these gentlemen are seeking, and ought to receive their support instead of opposition.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] told us, in his inimitable way, that the commissioners provided for by the bill were, by its very provisions, to be "tramps." And why "tramps?" Because they are prohibited from having such financial interest in the subject committed to their care as might influence their judgment in favor of personal instead of public and general interest. He told us that they were to be incompetent, to be utterly ignorant of the business in which they were to engage—"paupers" as well as "tramps." And why? Because, when appointed, they must not have their money invested in railroad securities or themselves be in the employment of railroad or transportation companies. His rule would bar out each member of Congress from voting upon questions except those in which he has a direct personal and financial interest, and would brand every man with ignorance of all kinds of business, except that in which he is for the time being engaged.

In pamphlets without number before the House and Senate Committees on Commerce during this discussion and the discussion of the question in previous Congresses, we have been furnished with numerous examples of when not to charge more for a shorter than for a longer haul would work injustice, and now because the framers of this bill have heard your arguments and admitted their force, you are not satisfied, but hurl your heaviest arguments against that portion of section 4 which provides for these very difficulties, where the commissioners are given power to suspend the operation of the general rule when not to do so would work injustice. This only shows how hard you are to satisfy, and gives rise to the suspicion that you are not overly eager to be convinced.

You tell us, as we have been told time out of mind, that the business of operating a railroad is of such an intricate character that it can not be controlled by general and fixed rules; and while we have not forgotten that the traffic managers of the companies somehow succeed in formulating such general rules for the control of subordinates and for the management of pools, this bill has acknowledged the difficulty and provides for it in a provision to give elasticity to the measure, with agencies to make effective that elasticity. And now you object because of this very elasticity. You say it intrusts men with dangerous power, while insisting that the power must reside in somebody. This objection can have but one meaning, and that is that the power must remain in the hands of men not responsible to the people nor acting for the general good, but under the influence of that selfishness which has made the necessity for such a law as the one now under discussion.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has raised objections which are the more surprising because coming from so able a lawyer as we know him to be.

The ink is scarcely dry which recorded the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upholding and defining the constitutional power of Congress over the subject-matter of this bill, and yet the learned gentleman treats us to a legal argument against the power. He absolutely insists that the power to regulate commerce among the States has nothing to do with railway traffic carried on between the people of the several States; that the interstate commerce carried on by the people is not commerce among the States at all.

Those gentlemen who assert as an objection that this is a bill "which nobody understands, nobody wants, and which everybody is going to vote for," may find consolation in the fact that the Constitution, which is the chart of our power, under which the nation has prospered and our liberties remained secure, is an instrument which the Supreme Court does not understand, or which, if it means what some of the constitutional lawyers of this House seem to think it does, is a Constitution which "nobody understands, nobody wants, and which everybody" insists is the grandest document ever written by human hands. I commend this consolation to those members of the House who feel constrained to vote for this bill in obedience to popular demand, and yet who fear that they show a lack of moral courage in doing so because of the supposed uncertainties in the language of this measure.

In answer to the argument that railway corporations were in a manner public corporations and the money invested to a certain extent dedicated to public use, because the States and Congress had chartered them, and the power of eminent domain been invoked for their benefit, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] says that nearly all of these corporations received their charters from the States and exercised the right of eminent domain under State laws as an argument against the power of the National Congress over this subject. This was a strange misunderstanding of the point and force of the argument, to which it was intended to be a reply, for a lawyer to make.

The argument was that the power of eminent domain had been lawfully exercised on behalf of all railway corporations, a power which can only be invoked to take private property for public use, and not on behalf of an individual or a private corporation for private benefit and use; and that, therefore, these railway corporations were by decided law public corporations, without reference to whether their charters were obtained from the States or the National Government.

So much for the objections to the language of the bill.

At the last session of Congress I supported and advocated the passage of the Senate bill, and regretted exceedingly that the majority in this House could not see in it the beginning of the solution of this interstate-commerce problem, not that it was all that I desired or that the best public sentiment demanded, but because I believed its main provisions took the right direction and were expressive of the results of the best experience in dealing with this question. I was opposed to the Reagan or House bill because it was experimental and ignored all the practical knowledge we had upon this question; because I did not believe its tendency was in the right direction as a whole, and because I did not believe its passage would be the beginning of a solution of this question, but would the rather retard that solution.

Unexpectedly to me, and as I suppose to most of the members of the House who knew with what tenacity the chairman of the Committee on Commerce adheres to convictions once formed, the conference committee whose appointment was made possible by the disagreement of the two Houses have submitted for our consideration a much better bill than we had any reason to hope for and one that I trust and believe will speedily become law.

Of course it is the result of compromise—as all conference bills are expected to be—a compromise not of principles but of methods, and I count it fortunate that it comes to us in such a shape that it can not be made a foot-ball of between the two Houses on a question of form of expression and so remain without final action during this Congress.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] has truly said this is the Cullom or Senate bill. It has also the one redeeming feature of the Reagan bill, the anti-pooling section greatly improved. The other part taken from the Reagan bill is simply a reaffirmation of the common-law right in the individual to bring suit changed so as to confer jurisdiction on Federal courts only. It neither adds to nor takes from the common law, and therefore does not hurt the bill nor does it help it so far as I am concerned.

But I am glad that it is in the bill, because the right "to sue and be sued" is held in such reverence by some gentlemen in this House. I am willing to add "line upon line and precept upon precept" in the way of assurance that they and their constituents are not to be deprived either of the right or the luxury of having a suit in court and of footing the bills.

What, then, is this bill? It clearly defines interstate commerce. It prohibits extortion and unjust discrimination. It prohibits a greater charge for a longer than for a shorter haul under "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," thus declaring the general rule that like and contemporaneous service, other things being equal, ought to have like compensation in the interest of fair dealing.

It provides for stability of rates so long as stability is at the same time fair and reasonable, and it provides for publicity of rates, because all the public have an interest in them, and to prevent undue advantage of one shipper over another. It provides for the establishment of a commission through which the public may become possessed of a knowledge of all the facts necessary to an intelligent judgment upon questions between them and the carriers and through which the provisions of the law may be enforced at public expense.

If a contest is to come it need no longer be the unequal combat between the individual and the vast power centered in the great railway corporations, for the Government of the United States is to be one party to the contention—not to oppress by its strength, but to mete out equal and exact justice.

With our present experience, in my judgment, any interstate-commerce bill with the commission feature left out would not be worth the paper it is written on. And here I am reminded that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has raised a constitutional objection to this feature of the bill—he claiming that it is beyond our power to create such a tribunal. He tells us that this is to be a judicial as well as an administrative body; that under the power to establish a supreme and inferior courts we have no right to combine administrative with judicial functions. Does the gentleman know of any Federal court of inferior jurisdiction, or State court for that matter, which does not exercise administrative power as an incident to its judicial functions?

Is it not true that very many of the railroads of the country are now being operated by the courts through receivers acting under their direction?

And, finally, we have a comprehensive provision against pooling, a provision designed to make competition a factor in fixing traffic rates, the true objective point of all this kind of legislation.

Aside from verbal criticism and opposition to all legislation the short and long haul clause, the anti-pooling section, and the provision for a commission have been the most vigorously assailed. This is not to be wondered at. If you rout the main army, the stragglers are sure to follow the line of retreat. Cut the vitals out of the bill, and the whole measure is dead.

In opposition to any legislation it is insisted that no evils exist which will not cure themselves if left to the operation of universal laws of trade—no evils not incident to all extensive businesses; that laws should be made to facilitate and not to hamper business; that Congress, not being made up of expert railroad managers, will only play the bull in the china-shop whenever it interferes in this business.

Good morals and high equity are invoked in protest against this legislation. Have not the railroads been a blessing? Have not they enriched the country and opened up all its vast area to possible settlement? Have not private individuals invested their money in them, and so secured to the people all these blessings? And shall we now with ignorant and ruthless hands interpose between these investors and their free and full enjoyment of their own? Are they not entitled to all the advantage secured by risk and foresight?

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] struck the key-note when he called attention to the public nature of this kind of property and showed that an investment in it was an investment in which the public had a direct interest; and was, therefore, a voluntary surrender of the investment to such public control as might be necessary and expedient for the protection of public interest. As no man has a right to seize upon the "gateways" of commerce for his exclusive private advantage, so has he no right to seize upon the highways of commerce and then use his possession to oppress the public. The people can not be barred from the advantages of the civilization of the age in which they live, nor can the world's knowledge be locked up for the use of the few.

To say that I have no right to complain if my produce is transported just a little cheaper than it was in the days of wagon-hauling is to say that I have no right to move along with the world in its progress; that if my house is just a little better than the wigwam of the savage I ought to be content.

The trouble with these objections is that they start from false premises, from a misconception of the nature of the relation which railroads sustain to the public.

There is another class of men who see only a set of robbers in transportation companies, and who would deal with them accordingly, forgetting that a bankrupt railroad company is like any other kind of bankruptcy, a bad thing for the community. These men minister to their own vanity and magnify their own importance by imagining that they are the special objects of the attention of railway magnates whose power is being constantly used to bring trouble upon their devoted heads. It is a harmless delusion, manifesting itself in the calling of hard names, which neither injure the railroads nor benefit the people, for this is a serious business, to be dealt with soberly and sensibly.

My colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] and others have made the claim that there are now few evils to be corrected; that whatever just ground for complaint has existed in the past has now been removed by the action of the companies themselves, as the result of their broader experience and the consequent adoption of better methods. And yet it should be remembered that these better methods, this correction of evils, have come to us since the people took hold of this question and commenced legislating in the States and pressing for Congressional action. Have we not a right to say that the abandonment of evil ways has, to some extent, resulted from the action of the people and the laws which have been enacted?

Competition, new mechanical appliances, increased business from increased production, have each had their influence, as we are compelled to admit; but law upheld by the courts has played its part in bringing the corporations to a better understanding of their relations to the public.

But it is not true that the people are now enjoying all that they have a right to demand in this regard. Aside from unjust discriminations between individuals and communities, the aggregate of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight on all the roads is much in excess of reasonable compensation for the services rendered and the money invested.

The capital stock and bonded debt of the one hundred and twenty-eight thousand miles of railway in the United States, according to the best railroad authority, exceeds $60,000 per mile in the aggregate. The actual cost of roadbed, track, and equipment does not exceed one-half that amount, including in the cost, municipal donations, land grants, and whatever else the constructors have received in the way of inducement to engage in these great enterprises. Allowing for the enormous profits of sub-contractors and construction syndicates, and for improvident and extravagant expenditures for purchases with depreciated currency, and all other expenses, legal and illegal, and still the cost to investors has not exceeded $40,000 per mile.

And yet this enormous property, so completely a part of our every business, so completely interwoven with all our industries, so powerful to make or mar our prosperity, during the last year paid to investors in interest and dividends over 4½ per cent. on a capitalization of $60,000 per mile, after paying operating expenses, taxes, repairs, renewals, and all other expenses incident to the business—a greater net return than is realized from any other class of income-earning property, taken as a whole, in the United States. This is 6¾ per cent. net on the most liberal estimate of the amount of money invested, and 9 per cent. on actual cost.

Remembering that this property is not like that of the individual, who has a right to make as much as he can with his own by fair and honest dealing; that it includes all investments, good and bad, in railroads; that very much of it has come from public instead of private sources; that its very existence has come from the exercise of the people's power of "eminent domain," and we are driven to the conviction that there is injustice somewhere, and that after all reductions the people are still being overtaxed for transportation, and have a right through this bill to find out where the injustice comes in and to have it remedied.

Considering the special sections of the bill, we find the point of most vigorous and general attack is section 4, the long and short haul section. While it will be conceded that, as a general rule, no more should be charged for a less than a greater service, it is insisted with a good deal of reason that this principle is not applicable to railway service, and can not be carried into successful practice without doing injustice, both to the companies and to individuals and communities.

While the section does not provide for mileage and tonnage rates, and can not by any torture of meaning be made to so provide, yet it must be admitted the general principle which authorizes a prohibition of a greater charge for a shorter than for a longer haul applies with equal force to mileage and tonnage rates.

I confess to some doubt about the wisdom of incorporating this section in the bill even with the qualifying words "substantially similar circumstances and conditions," and with the further provision for waiver in "special cases." There are so many elements which enter into the cost of transportation—the number of cars in a train, the number of men required to manage it, the distance moved without change or stop, whether the rolling stock is kept in constant use or is idle for more or less of the time, considerations of return freight, and a thousand and one other circumstances, which must confuse the judgment when an attempt is made to determine the fact of whether the "circumstances" and "conditions" are "substantially similar."

And then, too, I admit the right of a company, and even its duty, to charge less than a reasonable compensation, provided it is not below cost, to be made up somewhere else, under circumstances which often arise in the business. The state of the market may be such that freight will not move at all unless concessions are made, and thereby rolling-stock will remain in enforced idleness, to be taxed beyond its capacity at some future time. In such case it is better for all concerned that the trains shall be kept moving, and something be earned for investors and service be performed for the people. Half wages is better than no work and no pay, provided we do not fall into the habit of accepting half pay. And then again competition with other methods of transportation may deprive a road of all chance to earn freight, unless it takes less than a reasonable profit.

In such case it is the part of wisdom to take less than a reasonable sum, provided somebody else is not charged an unreasonable tax to make up an equality of earnings. I have no right to complain if some other community is so much more favorably situated than mine that the companies are compelled to give it rates less than reasonable, if my community is not charged more than reasonable rates. But section 4 has been forced into this bill by the most glaring and indefensible evils and inequalities connected with this whole business, and the managers of railroad companies have only themselves to blame if, in correcting these inequalities, injustice may sometimes be done to them.

I do not refer so much to the inequalities between through and local traffic as to inequalities in local traffic itself and inequalities between strictly through traffic from different points not affected by any other considerations than selfishness. Local rates build and ruin towns side by side; enrich and impoverish communities in close proximity to each other—local rates established by the arbitrary will of railway managers without reason, founded in cost, competition, or anything else proper to be considered in fixing rates. Section 4, well enforced, will put an end to this kind of work, even if it does not always secure equal and exact justice.

Again, a town situated nearer to its market than another town having the same kind of product, with just as much freight to be sent and just as much to be brought back, with equal facilities to obtain competing rates, with all other things equal, is by one device or another continually made to pay greater through rates than neighboring towns. I have known freight from New York intended for a town in my district to go through the town to a point beyond and then pay local rates back to escape the higher charges when billed direct.

I have known freight destined for the Atlantic coast to be sent westward, paying local rates, and then sent back over the same road through the place of starting and money saved over the rate which would have been paid if the freight had been sent direct, and I have known local rates to be raised to protect established rates on eastern shipments from being broken by this kind of out and back shipment. To correct such well-known abuses, which have kept a place in railroad polity, while other abuses have ceased, section 4 seemed necessary, and with some misgivings as to its probable effect upon transcontinental traffic and traffic from the Mississippi Valley to the seaboards, I still think its provisions are demanded to correct abuses not reached by other provisions of the bill. The power of waiver given to the commissioners alone makes it possible to prevent injustice and justifies the provision.

It is claimed that this is an extraordinary and dangerous power to put into the hands of five men. Granted; but the five men are to be disinterested judges, presumably competent for the position; and can it be said that the power is as dangerous in such hands as it is in the hands where it now is—interested and irresponsible, save to the companies which practice the abuses complained of?

It is charged that the corporations will find means to control the commission. Well, if that improbable thing should happen, such control can not be more complete than the control they now have of their own agents.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is very fearful that the existence of this commission would force the railroads into politics, and to take an unwonted part in the struggle between the great political parties of the country. He enumerates the changes which will take place in the next six years, the number of Federal judges to be appointed during the term of the next administration, and sees dangers lurking in every corner, because of a probable change in the control of national affairs. "Coming events cast their shadows before," and so the gentleman intends to take refuge in a vote against this bill.

It seems to me that I have somewhere heard it charged that the railroads are already taking an undue interest in politics, that they have been doing that for a long time, that they have corrupted the people, bought courts, juries, and legislatures; used their enormous resources to defeat honorable ambition to hold public position, and have done a great many other things, unfit to be done, to influence the politics of the country; and if I mistake not the political party to which the gentleman was once attached and with the remnants of which he still holds some sort of relation, came into existence partly because of this kind of charges. From his standpoint the danger has been and still is with us, and he ought not to be deterred from voting for this bill because of the possibility that the same danger will remain.

Does he think, does anybody think, that the inducement for railroad companies to engage in politics would be diminished by the passage of the more radical and far-reaching measure which the gentleman says he desires and will have, or nothing? Now, I do not imagine that the opposition to this bill because of the power conferred upon the commission in section 4, and other sections defining their powers and duties outside of Congress, arises so much from a fear about the doubtful meaning or the improper influence which may be exerted upon the commission as it does from an apprehension that an honest and intelligent board will be appointed, held back from undue participation in politics, because of the composition of the commission.

I speak, of course, of the objections sent here from the outside and not of the honest difference of opinion which exists among members as to the propriety or impropriety of this kind of legislation, but who are sometimes misled in their reasons by the skill of supposed experts in finding excuse and reason for their practices. Railroad officials, who have neat little inside arrangements by which they rob the stockholders and enrich themselves, are fearful that an honest commission will not decide that their schemes come under the head of "special cases." Favored shippers, who thrive at the expense of their neighbors, are troubled with the same fear.

Boards of trade, who, through their connection with transportation companies, have established a monopoly in the business of fixing market values, and have reduced to a science the business of speculating in the hopes and fears of others, see their business endangered in the event of this commission becoming to the people what the courts of the country have long been, an upright and wise tribunal for the settlement of the vexed questions growing out of this business of bringing producer and consumer together.

Commission merchants and favored buyers, it is hoped, will no longer be able to tax the individual shipper for the privilege of putting in his car-load of freight on their cheaper contract, made under the pretense that their larger shipments are akin to wholesale, while his smaller shipments are in the nature of retail business.

Straightforward people, who want justice for themselves and for others as well, including the railroads, and who have not lost their faith in humanity, whether it be humanity in private life or in public position, are not seriously troubled about any undue influence over the commissioners which we provide for.

The anti-pooling section has come in for its share of opposition, and I propose to give it a little attention. In doing so I am forcibly reminded that it is useless to look for consistency as against self-interest.

When railway corporations wanted to condemn private property for their use or when they wanted to sustain municipal subscriptions to their capital stock it was necessary to declare that they were public corporations engaged in a public business, and so they successfully argued to the courts; but when their necessities ceased, and the people began to demand rights under the law, sides changed immediately. They were no longer public but private bodies, doing business for private gain; but the courts were just as firm in maintaining the law in the interest of the people as they were in the interest of the corporations.

When the companies were seeking aid to build their roads, or asking Congress for subsidies and land grants, they were not slow to point out the need of competition to prevent first-comers from extortion. Now, and for some years past, the very best ability procurable is and has been engaged in trying to show that competition in this kind of business is the very worst enemy of the people. The pool is the new and improved device by which the people are to be protected from unjust discriminations and extortionate charges, and the railroad companies saved from ruining each other.

If Congress would only legalize this illegal device, according to these new philosophers, there would be no further need of law to regulate this commerce. In all ordinary business it has been supposed that competition might safely be trusted to keep prices within reasonable bounds; that unjust monopoly and competition could not well exist together. In the law-books combinations to keep prices up or to raise them and prevent the operation of the natural laws of trade have been named "conspiracy;" hence the demand that this illegal thing called a pool—this "conspiracy"—shall be made legal. Why? In the interest of stability of rates and to prevent railroad wars, through which these corporations metaphorically cut each other's throats.

Such is the argument, elaborated with all sorts of ingenious illustrations and striking examples. But somehow it does not convince. You will ruin the longer road if you do not allow it through the pool to get a share of the through freight; and when you have effected the ruin and destroyed a competing line what is to become of competition to keep down freights to reasonable limits?

But stop. Competition will not do; the pool was invented to prevent it, and the argument does not hold together. Now, I ask, what is the purpose of waging rate wars between lines of roads if it is not to force the re-establishment of a broken pool or to compel readjustment of relations in the pool? If the pool is prohibited and the prohibition enforced, have we not removed the cause of rate wars, which are said to be so ruinous?

If nothing is to be gained in the long run, if no pool treaty is a possible outcome, if the end is to be the same as the beginning so far as the relations of the competing roads to each other and the public are concerned, does any one believe that these corporations will engage in the delectable but unprofitable business of bankrupting each other? If a pool is a good thing for one town with a few competing roads, it is good for another, and so on until it includes all roads and all points. The only logical conclusion of the argument in favor of pools is that all the roads and transportation companies of the United States ought to be under one management, selected by the stockholders, and selected with the sole view of earning the largest dividends, for it is neither natural nor human that a stockholder in a railroad or any other corporation should look with complacency upon measures designed to lessen his dividends.

Charter prohibitions against consolidation of parallel or competing lines ought to be repealed and we ought to concede that here is a business which can only safely be carried on as the one great and overpowering monopoly. For one, I am not ready to do this thing.

I conclude, therefore, that the anti-pooling provision, section 5 of the bill, is wise and necessary, and will bring to the people much needed relief while it will take from the roads none of their legitimate rights.

Taken all together, the bill seems to me to be the best expression of our experience which has ever been offered for Congressional approval.

It is not framed in the spirit of animosity or of reckless disregard of property rights, nor with a view to thoughtless experiments with great interests. It is not hasty legislation without a full and fair examination of the facts upon which it is based and the needs of such enactments. Because I believe it to be moderate in its requirements and generally wise in its provisions. I shall cheerfully vote for its passage.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-eighth Congress I expressed my doubts and fears touching the fourth section of the Reagan bill, the section regulating the long and short haul. In the remarks which I then submitted I gave my reasons for the fears entertained, stating that I believed that the fourth section would operate against Iowa and the points remote from the sea-board. At the same time I said that even if the fourth section were not stricken out I would still vote for the Reagan bill, as it was, rather than not have any legislation upon this great question; and I then, as in this Congress, voted for the Reagan bill, rather than have legislation of this character fail, rather than let the vast railroad system go uncontrolled by the General Government. That has been my position on this question. That is my position now. I am opposed to having the great commercial interests of 60,000,000 of people controlled and regulated solely by a dividend interest. The year 1886 gave us of oats 624,000,000 bushels; hay, 45,000,000 tons; corn, 1,665,000,000 bushels; wheat, 457,000,000 bushels; and adding merchandise, live-stock and passengers transported, the relations of railroads to our people become vitally important and apparent. I protest against a few men, guided wholly by their own selfish interests, controlling the tracks over which these vast products and interests must pass, when the Constitution of the country invites the control by the General Government. But I am not one of those who every proposition in a bill until it just suits my particular opinions and the particular interests and locality that I may represent. There must be some compromises in all great legislative conflicts. Since the formation of this Government the line of legislation is everywhere marked with compromises and concessions before great enactments are secured.

He who will say that he has no misgivings as to how some features of this bill may operate upon his locality and upon the country at large, speaks, it seems to me, without sufficient consideration. I am confident, however, that any losses that may be sustained at the beginning will be more than compensated as experience and time may perfect our present great undertaking.

But conceding that some injury may come to our localities, it should be remembered that it is sixty days after the passage of the bill before it goes into operation in its working features. The next Congress meets in December. We will have had some trial of its workings by that time, and we will be swift to correct any of its provisions that are found to be unsatisfactory. We will have our constituencies back of us in our efforts to improve the law. If are found to be a bad feature we can dispense with them or increase their powers at the next session. At this hour the masses of the people of this country on this question. I went home during the vacation for the purpose of feeling the pulse of my people on this question, more than for any other reason, and I did not talk with a single person but who said to me, "By all means give us this bill and let us make a start in controlling transportation." Since my return I have, by telegram and letter, been advised of the eager anxiety of my people for the passage of this bill. They are reading, thinking, and talking, and I tell you that the people demand that the bill agreed upon by the conferees of the House and Senate be crystalized into law.

DEMAND SOME LEGISLATION

This is the sentiment of my people, although we are almost in the center of the nation and a thousand miles remote from the seaboard. They demand that we enter upon the control of the only real avenues of transportation open for them in the land—the railroad track. They demand a commencement. They understand that there are grave difficulties in our way; that it is a new and weighty problem; but they demand work instead of waiting. They want action in place of promises. They want us to do our best in starting this great reform instead of carping, criticising, and fault-finding with every effort to bring the iron horse under the guidance of the sovereign hand of the people.

It is easy to criticise. It is easy to find fault with any bill, any law, any man, or any religion. It was easier for Tom Paine to denounce Christianity than it was for him to offer a substitute better suited to the wants of his age.

On yesterday my colleague [Mr. WEAVER] sneered at this bill because some differ as to the meaning of some of its provisions. His language was plain enough, and yet men in his hearing differed as to his meaning and his motives. Shall the Bible be closed because hundreds of different creeds have sprung from it? There are but few laws that must not sooner or later undergo interpretation from the courts. Shall we therefore make no laws? Must we keep the people waiting, waiting, waiting until we can all agree? No, no; we must do the best that we can; but do it now. Years have been spent in discussing this great question of interstate commerce. Volumes have been published on it. At last we have before us a bill containing much, very much, that is good. Let us pass it into law, and improve it as our experience may point the way.

Every man here knows that to vote down this bill now is to put off railroad control for years. Let him beware who takes that grave responsibility!

Let us examine this bill as presented by the conferees—the bill now brought before us after days, weeks, and months of careful, conscientious toil by the committees of conference of the Senate and House—and let us see what it means. I will add this bill to my remarks as a part thereof for fuller information to those who desire to give this matter the fullest investigation.

This bill aims at three great reforms: First, to do away with pooling. Who will say that the people of this country do not demand this? Secondly, to do away with the rebate system. The people want this, and the railroads want this, in my judgment, for the rebate system is a great trouble and expense to them, as well as a cloak whereby the weak shipper is plundered for the benefit of the strong. On that one point and on that only are the railroad interests and the people in full accord touching this bill. The third is the long and short haul element of the bill. It gives fixed rates; it absolutely does away with all pooling, the rebate system, and forces the railroads to proclaim to all the people just what they are charging to each.

Now the fourth section is that which troubles us all most, I admit. But this bill which the conferees have brought before us has a safety-valve in the section; and I want to say right here that I believe each member of the conference acted conscientiously and laboriously and intelligently in bringing this bill before the House. Let any one of you ask any railroad man or any shipper, large or small, in this country what kind of a bill he would get up to meet the necessities of the people touching transportation. I have done so. There is a uniform answer—"We can not do it; the questions are too complicated." With that admission from experts, how easy it is to get up here and assail and ridicule the bill? But this is no time for ridicule, if gentlemen are as sincere, as they ought to be. Take my colleague [Mr. WEAVER] the other day spending over an hour in burlesquing a bill which every farmer and shipper of Iowa demands to be passed as a great entering step in this mighty question. One must be blessed with self-confidence, or cursed with recklessness, who can thus jeopardize great suffering interests of a State and nation, because his individual notions are not all expressed in the bill.

THE RAILROADS,

I am told, are not fighting this bill. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that any man is ignorant of the fact that they are. His experience and observation are different from mine if he thinks otherwise. I have not come in contact with a single gentleman representing railroad interests who wants this bill to pass. All want to defeat it. There is not a railway in this country but will rejoice if this bill is beaten by this Congress, not one. And the people say "Gentlemen, do the best you can, but do give us something for a starter on this question." Here we are growing and multiplying in numbers, commerce, and wealth, and the iron track is the only road over which it can travel; and yet the American Congress is paralyzed in the presence of that necessity, and says we can do nothing because we cannot agree.

I believe that this Congress will adjourn with the commendations of the people because we have met this great question like fearless men. I shall vote for this bill without a moment's hesitation, without faltering, and without fear. I shall vote for it conscientiously even if I had to admit that it has imperfections. And I want to say here and now in response to what was said by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] that "we should recommit the bill and get rid of the fourth section"—I say no more recommitment of this bill. We have it now where a single vote by this House will put it before the President, and I believe before the people as a law. But recommit it and you enter anew into a dangerous field; and while I believe the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts who made that suggestion, made it as he always does, conscientiously and honestly, I warn my fellow-members against any such course, and ask that this bill as it has now been given to us, after months of discussion and earnest consideration, shall be given to the people as law.

Mr. LONG. You know, of course, this bill is now in the form of a conference report, and is therefore entitled to privilege.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I know that very well; and I know it is the "privilege" of the House to vote for it and put it through, and I hope that "privilege" they will exercise. But we all know that if we non-concur in the action of the conferees the bill is lost, and I protest against recommitment.

In urging the passage of this bill I have no disposition to be unjust to the railroad interests of this country. Not at all. I am simply demanding that control over them which the Constitution entitles us to. We are all glad to see the railroad coming into our towns and neighborhoods. We want them, and they need us and our products. But we are tired of their being

SUPREME MASTERS.

Their coming builds up towns and enriches communities; so, too, their unjust management has often destroyed cities and towns and torn down hard-earned fortunes. Railroad owners must learn the new lesson that is coming to us all in this country, and that is to be content with a reasonable profit on investments, and that labor, small capital, and small shippers have their rights just as well as stock-owners and powerful shippers.

This city is to-day swarming with keen, zealous, able trying to defeat the passage of this bill. Every vote cast at their dictation and every vote cast against this bill is a vote for railroad supremacy and against the people. I have faith in the great future of this country, and that it will more and more be the best land for the happiness of all classes of the people. The passage of this bill will be one of the greatest steps that can be taken to speed the coming of still happier days for our people. Those now opposing this bill can depend upon it that, when once a law, the control of railroads by the General Government will never be abandoned. We may add to and take from, but the people will be masters, demanding and according every right guaranteed by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, with these remarks I will yield the floor, but I will incorporate in my remarks the statement of the House conferees which points out the difference between this bill and the House bill, usually known as the Reagan bill. In this connection I am glad to have it from Mr. REAGAN'S own lips that the bill now before us to be voted on is a great achievement for the people.

THE INSTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used, under a common control, management, or arrangement, for a continuous carriage or shipment, from one State or Territory of the United States, or of the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, and also to the transportation in like manner of property shipped from any place in the United States to a foreign country and carried from such place to a port of trans-shipment, or shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States and carried to such place from a port of entry either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country: Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the transportation of passengers or property, or to the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of property, wholly within one State, and not shipped to or from a foreign country from or to any State or Territory as aforesaid.

The term "railroad" as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease; and the term "transportation" shall include all instrumentalities of shipment or carriage.

All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, shall be reasonable and just; and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 2. That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers and property to and from their several lines and those connecting therewith, and shall not discriminate in their rates and charges between such connecting lines; but this shall not be construed as requiring any such common carrier to give the use of its tracks or terminal facilities to another carrier engaged in like business.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any other common carrier or carriers for the pooling of freights of different and competing railroads, or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion thereof; and in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

SEC. 6. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall print and keep for public inspection schedules showing the rates and fares and charges for the transportation of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established and which are in force at the time upon its railroad, as defined by the first section of this act. The schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places upon its railroad between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force upon such railroad, and shall also state separately the terminal charges and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part of the aggregate of such aforesaid rates and fares and charges. Such schedules shall be plainly printed in large type, of at least the size of ordinary pica, and copies for the use of the public shall be kept in every depot or station upon any such railroad, in such places and in such form that they can be conveniently inspected.

Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act receiving freight in the United States to be carried through a foreign country to any place in the United States shall also in like manner print and keep for public inspection, at every depot where such freight is received for shipment, schedules showing the through rates established and charged by such common carrier to all points in the United States beyond the foreign country to which it accepts freight for shipment; and any freight shipped from the United States through a foreign country into the United States, the through rate on which shall not have been made public as required by this act, shall, before it is admitted into the United States from said foreign country, be subject to customs duties as if said freight were of foreign production; and any law in conflict with this section is hereby repealed.

No advance shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published as aforesaid by any common carrier in compliance with the requirements of this section, except after ten days' public notice, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in force, and the time when the increased rates, fares, or charges will go into effect; and the proposed changes shall be shown by printing new schedules, or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept for public inspection. Reductions in such published rates, fares, or charges may be made without previous public notice; but whenever any such reduction is made, notice of the same shall immediately be publicly posted, and the changes made shall immediately be made public by printing new schedules, or shall immediately be plainly indicated upon the schedules at the time in force and kept for public inspection.

And when any such common carrier shall have established and published its rates, fares, and charges, in compliance with the provisions of this section, it shall be unlawful for such common carrier to charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for the transportation of passengers or property, or for any services in connection therewith, than is specified in such published schedule of rates, fares, and charges as may at the time be in force.

Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the commission hereinafter provided for copies of its schedules of rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published in compliance with the requirements of this section, and shall promptly notify said commission of all changes made in the same.

Every such common carrier shall also file with said commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party. And in cases where passengers and freight pass over continuous lines or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates or fares or charges for such continuous lines or routes, copies of such joint tariffs shall also, in like manner, be filed with said commission. Such joint rates, fares, and charges on such continuous lines so filed as aforesaid shall be made public by such common carriers when directed by said commission, in-so-far as may, in the judgment of the commission, be deemed practicable; and said commission shall from time to time prescribe the measure of publicity which shall be given to such rates, fares, and charges, or to such part of them as it may deem it practicable for such common carriers to publish, and the places in which they shall be published; but no common carrier party to any such joint tariff shall be liable for the failure of any other common carrier party thereto to observe and adhere to the rates, fares, or charges thus made and published.

If any such common carrier shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its schedules or tariffs of rates, fares, and charges as provided in this section, or any part of the same, such common carrier shall, in addition to other penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States in the judicial district wherein the principal office of said common carrier is situated or wherein such offense may be committed, and if such common carrier be a foreign corporation, in the judicial circuit wherein such common carrier accepts traffic and has an agent to perform such service, to compel compliance with the aforesaid provisions of this section; and such writ shall issue in the name of the people of the United States, at the relation of the commissioners appointed under the provisions of this act; and failure to comply with its requirements shall be punishable as and for a contempt; and the said commissioners, as complainants, may also apply, in any such circuit court of the United States, for a writ of injunction against such common carrier, to restrain such common carrier from receiving or transporting property among the several States and Territories of the United States, or between the United States and adjacent foreign countries, or between ports of trans-shipment and of entry and the several States and Territories of the United States, as mentioned in the first section of this act, until such common carrier shall have complied with the aforesaid provisions of this section of this act.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any combination, contract, or agreement, expressed or implied, to prevent, by change of time schedule, carriage in different cars, or by other means or devices, the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination; and no break of bulk, stoppage, or interruption made by such common carrier shall prevent the carriage of freights from being and being treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such break, stoppage, or interruption was made in good faith for some necessary purpose, and without any intent to avoid or unnecessarily interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That in case any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall do, cause to be done, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall omit to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, such common carrier shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for the full amount of damages sustained in consequence of any such violation of the provisions of this act, together with a reasonable counsel or attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court in every case of recovery, which attorney's fee shall be taxed and collected as part of the costs in the case.

SEC. 9. That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the commission as hereinafter provided for, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such common carrier may be liable under the provisions of this act, in any district or circuit court of the United States of competent jurisdiction; but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt. In any such action brought for the recovery of damages the court before which the same shall be pending may compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of the corporation or company defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation or company party to any such suit; the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

SEC. 10. That any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or, whenever such common carrier is a corporation, any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, who, alone or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act, or shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000 for each offense.

SEC. 11. That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the interstate commerce commission, which shall be composed of five commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for the term of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1887, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired time of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. Not more than three of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. No person in the employ of or holding any official relation to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or owning stock or bonds thereof, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of or hold such office. Said commissioners shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. No vacancy in the commission shall impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission.

SEC. 12. That the commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created; and for the purposes of this act the commission shall have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such common carrier or other person to appear before said commission (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

SEC. 13. That any person, firm, corporation, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any body-politic or municipal organization complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in contravention of the provisions thereof, may apply to said commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the charges thus made shall be forwarded by the commission to such common carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission. If such common carrier, within the time specified, shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, said carrier shall be relieved of liability to the complainnat only for the particular violation of law thus complained of. If such carrier shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the matters complained of in such manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

Said commission shall in like manner investigate any complaint forwarded by the railroad commissioner or railroad commission of any State or Territory, at the request of such commissioner or commission, and may institute any inquiry on its own motion in the same manner and to the same effect as though complaint had been made.

No complaint shall at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant.

SEC. 14. That whenever an investigation shall be made by said commission, it shall be its duty to make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall include the findings of fact upon which the conclusions of the commission are based, together with its recommendation as to what reparation, if any, should be made by the common carrier to any party or parties who may be found to have been injured; and such findings so made shall thereafter, in all judicial proceedings, be deemed prima facie evidence as to each and every fact found.

All reports of investigations made by the commission shall be entered of record, and a copy thereof shall be furnished to the party who may have complained, and to any common carrier that may have been complained of.

SEC. 15. That if in any case in which an investigation shall be made by said commission it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the commission, either by the testimony of witnesses or other evidence, that anything has been done or omitted to be done in violation of the provisions of this act, or of any law cognizable by said commission, by any common carrier, or that any injury or damage has been sustained by the party or parties complaining, or by other parties aggrieved in consequence of any such violation, it shall be the duty of the commission to forthwith cause a copy of its report in respect thereto to be delivered to such common carrier, together with a notice to said common carrier to cease and desist from such violation, or to make reparation for the injury so found to have been done, or both, within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission; and if, within the time specified, it shall be made to appear to the commission that such common carrier has ceased from such violation of law, and has made reparation for the injury found to have been done, in compliance with the report and notice of the commission, or to the satisfaction of the party complaining, a statement to that effect shall be entered of record by the commission, and the said common carrier shall thereupon be relieved from further liability or penalty for such particular violation of law.

SEC. 16. That whenever any common carrier, as defined in and subject to the provisions of this act, shall violate or refuse or neglect to obey any lawful order or requirement of the commission in this act named, it shall be the duty of the commission, and lawful for any company or person interested in such order or requirement, to apply, in a summary way, by petition, to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity in the judicial district in which the common carrier complained of has its principal office, or in which the violation or disobedience of such order or requirement shall happen, alleging such violation or disobedience, as the case may be; and the said court shall have power to hear and determine the matter, on such short notice to the common carrier complained of as the court shall deem reasonable; and such notice may be served on such common carrier, his or its officers, agents, or servants, in such manner as the court shall direct; and said court shall proceed to hear and determine the matter speedily as a court of equity, and without the formal pleadings and proceedings applicable to ordinary suits in equity, but in such manner as to do justice in the premises; and to this end such court shall have power, if it think fit, to direct and prosecute, in such mode and by such persons as it may appoint, all such inquiries as the court may think needful to enable it to form a just judgment in the matter of such petition; and on such hearing the report of said commission shall be prima facie evidence of the matters therein stated; and if it be made to appear to such court on such hearing or on report of any such person or persons that the lawful order or requirement of said commission drawn in question has been violated or disobeyed, it shall be lawful for such court to issue a writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to restrain such common carrier from further continuing such violation or disobedience of such order or requirement of said commission, and enjoining obedience to the same; and in case of any disobedience of any such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, it shall be lawful for such court to issue writs of attachment, or any other process of said court incident or applicable to writs of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, against such common carrier, and if a corporation, against one or more of the directors, officers, or agents of the same, or against any owner, lessee, trustee, receiver, or other person failing to obey such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and said court may, if it shall think fit, make an order directing such common carrier or other person so disobeying such writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, to pay such sum of money, not exceeding for each carrier or person in default the sum of $500, for every day after a day to be named in the order that such carrier or other person shall fail to obey such injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise; and such moneys shall be payable, as the court shall direct, either to the party complaining, or into court to abide the ultimate decision of the court, or into the Treasury; and payment thereof may, without prejudice to any other mode of recovering the same, be enforced by attachment or order in the nature of a writ of execution, in like manner as if the same had been recovered by a final decree in personam in such court. When the subject in dispute shall be of the value of $2,000 or more, either party to such proceeding before said court may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, under the same regulations now provided by law in respect of security for such appeal; but such appeal shall not operate to stay or supersede the order of the court or the execution of any writ or process thereon; and such court may, in every such matter, order the payment of such costs and counsel fees as shall be deemed reasonable. Whenever any such petition shall be filed or presented by the commission it shall be the duty of the district attorney, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, to prosecute the same; and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States. For the purposes of this act, excepting its penal provisions, the circuit courts of the United States shall be deemed to be always in session.

SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. Said commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before said commission and be heard, in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of either party interested. Said commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Either of the members of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations.

SEC. 18. That each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable in the same manner as the salaries of judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive an annual salary of $3,500, payable in like manner. The commission shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employés as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The commission shall be furnished by the Secretary of the Interior with suitable offices and all necessary office supplies. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

All of the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expenses for transportation incurred by the commissioners, or by their employés under their orders, in making any investigation in any other places than the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid, on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission and the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 19. That the principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general sessions shall be held; but whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expense prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact pertaining to the business of any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act.

SEC. 20. That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interests paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipment; the number of employés and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance-sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts with other common carriers as the commission may require; and the said commission may, within its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe (if in the opinion of the commission it is practicable to prescribe such uniformity and methods of keeping accounts) a period of time within which all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

SEC. 21. That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report to the Secretary of the Interior, which shall be by him transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports issued from the Interior Department. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the commission may deem necessary.

SEC. 22. That nothing in this act shall apply to the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, State, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and expositions for exhibition thereat, or the issuance of mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion; nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employés, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies or their officers and employés; and nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies: Provided, That no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act.

SEC. 23. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated for the use and purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, A. D. 1888, and the intervening time anterior thereto.

SEC. 24. That the provisions of sections 11 and 18 of this act, relating to the appointment and organization of the commission herein provided for, shall take effect immediately, and the remaining provisions of this act shall take effect sixty days after its passage.

STATEMENT OF CONFEREES ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

[Required by Rule XXIX.]

The House conferees on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the bill of the Senate "to regulate commerce," and the bill of the House "to regulate commerce among the States, and prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers," make the following detailed statement of the changes between the House bill and the substitute herewith appended.

The action of the House being to adopt a single amendment, your committee, without attempting to call attention to the precise changes made in each section of the bill, report to the House the substance and effect of the changes made, as follows:

The bill of the House applied only to the transportation of freight, and the bill as adopted embraces the transportation of passengers as well as freight.

The bill of the House was limited to the regulation of such transportation on railroads. The bill as reported provides for the regulation of the transportation of property partly by railroad and partly by water, when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement, for a continuous carriage or shipment from one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to any other State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia.

The bill which we report defines the term "railroad," as used in it, to include all bridges, ferries used or operated with any railroad, which is in addition to the provisions of the House bill.

The second section of the substitute bill adopts substantially the provisions of the House bill against discrimination by special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and other devices, and declares that any one making such discrimination shall be guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful.

The third section of the substitute embraces substantially the provisions of the bill of the House, in requiring equal facilities and advantages for all shippers, without exception, and has a provision requiring equal facilities for the interchange of traffic with all other railroads for the carriage of property and passengers, and forbids any discrimination by one railroad in the facilities furnished against any other railroad. It contains a clause declaring that this act shall not be construed as requiring such common carrier to give the use of its tracks or terminal facilities to any common carrier engaged in like business.

The fourth section adopts substantially the provisions of the House bill on the long and short haul, with the following proviso: That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for a longer than for a shorter distance for the transportation of passengers and property, and that the commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section.

The fifth section of the substitute bill is a copy of the clause in the House bill prohibiting pooling, with an amendment striking out the words of the House bill "by dividing," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or to divide," and with the addition of the words in line 3, after the word "combination," "with any other common carrier or carriers."

The sixth section is a substitute for the provisions of the House and Senate bills in relation to the publication of schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property. Instead of requiring the rates to be posted up, as was provided in the House bill, it requires that, after ninety days from the passage of the act, every common carrier subject to its provisions shall have printed, and keep for public inspection, schedules showing such rates, fares, and charges, and, in addition to requiring the railroads to give publicity at all of the depots on their several lines, it gives authority to the commission, where it is proper and necessary, to require them to give publicity to their rates to other places beyond the lines of their several railroads.

It also provides that the rates, fares, and charges shall not be raised except after ten days of public notice, but that they may be reduced without previous public notice; the notice, however, shall be simultaneous with the reduction itself, and it requires that all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the commission provided for in the bill copies of the schedules which have been established, and shall promptly notify said commission of all changes made in the same; and that they shall file with the commission copies of all contracts, arrangements, or agreements with other common carriers in relation to traffic affected by the provisions of this bill; and in cases where passengers and freights pass over continuous lines or routes operated by more than one common carrier, and the several common carriers operating such lines or routes establish joint tariffs of rates or fares or charges for such continuous lines or routes, copies of such joint tariffs shall also be filed with the commission, and made public, if so directed by the commission.

The section also provides that where common carriers subject to its provisions shall neglect or refuse to file or publish its schedules of tariffs or rates and fares, or any part of the same, such common carrier shall, in addition to the penalties herein prescribed, be subject to a writ of mandamus, to be issued by any circuit court of the United States, in any judicial district wherein the principal office of the common carrier is situated, or wherein such offense may be committed, requiring a compliance with the provisions of the act.

The seventh section of the substitute bill contains substantially the provisions of the first part of the second section of the House bill in relation to the continuous carriage of property and persons from the place of shipment to the place of destination.

The eighth section of the substitute bill contains the substance of the seventh section of the House bill in regard to damages and counsel's fees, but expressed in somewhat different language.

The ninth section of the substitute bill is a new section, which provides that persons claiming to have been damaged by the action of common carriers may proceed for recovery of their damages either in the courts of the United States or before the commission herein provided for, as they may elect, but not before both tribunals. This section, which gives jurisdiction to courts of the United States, does not give jurisdiction in civil suits to the State courts, as was provided for in the House bill.

This section of the substitute bill also provides that the courts shall have power to compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of the corporation or company defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation or company party to any such suit; and it provides further that the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but that such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The tenth section of the substitute bill makes it a penal offense to violate any of the provisions of this act, and is substantially the eighth section of the House bill, except that it puts the maximum of the fine which may be imposed at the sum of $5,000 instead of $2,000, as was provided for by the House bill.

The eleventh and subsequent sections to the twenty-first, inclusive, of the substitute bill contain the substance of the Senate's bill providing for a commission, except as modified by the provisions of the substitute bill herein recited.

It provides for a commission to consist of five persons whose term of office shall be for six years, except for the first appointments, which are to be for two, three, four, five, and six years. The members of this commission are to be appointed by the President by and with the advice of the Senate. Their principal office shall be in Washington, but they may hold sessions at other places than Washington, and a single member of the commission may take testimony anywhere, as may be directed by the commission.

These commissioners have salaries of $7,500 each. The commission has the power to appoint a secretary, with an annual salary of $3,500, and has authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employés as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The nineteenth section of the Senate's bill, providing for a reference of the question of pooling to the commission, is not embraced in this substitute.

Section 22 of the substitute bill, among other things, provides that nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but that the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies, with a proviso that no pending litigation shall in any way be affected by this act.

Section 24 of the substitute bill provides that the act shall go into effect sixty days after its passage, as in the opinion of your committee it was deemed best to give the railroads sufficient time to prepare their schedules and to modify their management in accordance with the provisions of this bill. The appointment of the commission, however, is to be made at once, as it has to be organized, and as said schedules of rates and charges have to be filed with said commission.

J. H. REAGAN,
CHARLES F. CRISP,
A. J. WEAVER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PETERS. I do not expect to argue this question, because to undertake that would be futile in the short space of the ten minutes allotted to me. Like the speaker who has preceded me, I am ready and willing to vote for this bill. In the Forty-eighth Congress I opposed what was known as the long and short haul provision. I am opposed to it yet. That is, I am opposed to any provision of that kind that would have any binding force and validity. I am not opposed to the provision in this bill because I do not believe it has any binding force or validity; and I desire to call attention to one or two things in connection with it.

The great cry for legislation upon this subject has been brought about because of complaints, and these complaints may be classed under a few heads that are embraced within the provisions of this bill. One of the great complaints was of discrimination. Another was of pooling. And I believe that almost every complaint that has ever been made against the transportation companies of this country can be embraced within one or the other of those two heads, namely, discrimination and pooling. As this bill attempts to remedy, and as I think to some extent does remedy, the defects that have grown out of our system in connection with discrimination and pooling, I am satisfied with the bill as regards those matters. When it comes to this long and short haul provision, as I have said, I do not think the provision which appears in this bill amounts to anything. It seems to me a moment's consideration will convince any one that is the case.

In the first place the language of the clause is so indefinite that it can not amount to anything; and if a court is ever called upon to give a construction to it, and follows the usual and well-known law in relation to the construction of the statutes, then it would construe that fourth section as not applying to freights at all. The court would hold that it can only and does only apply to passengers, and any curtailment of power that may be enacted over the passenger traffic in railroad transportation, in my judgment, will not affect, or injure, or prejudice the great passenger traffic of the United States.

Listen to the language of this section of the bill:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property.

What kind of property? Property like passengers.

A MEMBER. Live-stock.

Mr. PETERS. I submit that any legal construction would be to that effect.

Mr. BURROWS. They must be all of a kind, either all white or all black.

Mr. PETERS. The section as punctuated in this bill, and as written, only affects the passenger traffic; and so I do not care.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask the gentleman, would not that apply to live-stock as being a like kind of property?

Mr. PETERS. I simply make that suggestion; but aside from that the very conditions expressed in the fourth section are such that it can not affect the great freights of the West. In addition to all that is the elastic provision in the bill—

That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

So that I say that the fourth section has no terrors for me. I do not believe it can affect my people in Kansas one way or the other, and, therefore, I am perfectly willing, for the remaining provisions of this bill, to take all there is in this fourth section.

But the grand part of this bill, to my mind, is the commissioner part of it. The people of the United States have never had an opportunity to employ some one with their own money and confide to them the duty of looking up the statistics in relation to this railroad question from the people's side of the case. Railroads have employed statisticians and managers and lawyers to look up the statistics of this great transportation question from the railroad side of the case. But the people have never had any parties under their own control or in their employ exclusively for the purpose of looking up the facts of the transportation question from their side of the case. That is just what this commissioner system will give to them. I know it is the case that no one has argued upon this question, either in the House or out of it—and I exempt no one, I will not exempt myself—no one has argued upon this question either in the House or out of it but has been prejudiced or biased for or against railroad transportation companies.

We have never had a fair and impartial investigation of the questions growing out of this question of railroad transportation. Appoint this commission, then, political as they will be, and as I would have them, because I want to hold the party which has the majority of the commission responsible for the action of that body. I would not give a snap for five commissioners there that were not responsible to any party; I would not expect them to amount to anything. It is the very fact that they will be held responsible to whichever of the great parties may be in power in this country that will make them energetic and faithful in seeking and giving out such information upon this subject as they think will be in the interest of the people.

The mere fact that they may be called a political body has no terrors for me. I want the party that has the controling majority of the commission to be held responsible for the conduct of that majority. I want this commission created because I want these questions of railroad transportation investigated and reported upon from a standpoint from which they have never before been investigated. I believe, as I have already said, that the greatest benefit that can result from legislation of this kind will be from the working of that commission. Talk about this commission having unlimited power, why it has only the power that is necessary in order to carry out the purposes for which it is created. Its first power is to make inquiry into the question of interstate-railroad transportation.

Do we not need that? Do we not desire that? Is not that what the people want, and what they have clamored for? The next power of the commission is to investigate complaints that may be made against the transportation companies. They can investigate them and ascertain facts, and then their finding of fact in any case shall be prima facie evidence in regard to the case when it comes into court. Is there any injustice in that? Is it any unusual grant of power to such a body to allow them to ascertain facts and then to declare that their ascertainment, or the conclusion at which they arrive, shall be prima facie evidence of the existence of the fact? That is all there is in this grant of power to these commissioners. Then in all cases where more than two thousand dollars' worth of property is involved an appeal is allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States.

This board of commissioners can do nothing except to ascertain, prima facie, the existence of the facts, and then the courts of the country are appealed to, and if any party can show that the ascertainment of the commission is not correct, that party will have the right to make that proof, and the ascertainment by the commission will amount to nothing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, by the eighth section of the Constitution, Congress shall have power to regulate commerce between the States. Under that section of the Constitution this bill was born. The country is demanding something of the kind. In 1865, when the great war closed, we had only 33,000 miles of railway in the United States. Now we have 127,000 miles of main track, and this wonderful fact strikes our minds that in twenty-one years the railway mileage of the United States has increased threefold, and that its efficiency and carrying capacity have increased more than sixfold over what they were twenty-one years ago. Now, it is admitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and by almost every other gentleman who has addressed the House, that the country demands some action upon this subject. Here is a vast mass of aggregated capital which, under the laws of human nature, is certain to be aggressive.

Men will continue to make all they can unless they are restrained, and we know that these railway magnates will put all into their pockets that they possibly can. The country now demands that this eighth section of the Constitution shall be put in force. I concede, as every speaker has conceded, that this bill is not a thing that I would look for or hope for, but I ask the House to remember that this is the first act passed by the Federal Government to put in force the power that is granted to Congress to regulate commerce, and I ask the lawyers of this House to remember that there is not a single provision of the common law which has not been tried and legislated upon again and yet again, and improved and amended until finally a law of equity has been reached which has been embedded, as it were, in the common law of the land.

I have heard criticism again and again upon this fourth section. I can not do better than occupy the little time I have in reading and commenting upon it. I deny that it is ambiguous and that it can not be understood. It consists of just three sentences—no more and no less. What are they? Let us read them seriatim. The first is what?

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act—

That is the railways—

to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

Now, shade of Lindley Murray! is there anybody who can not understand that sentence? I am literally astounded that so level-headed a man as my friend from Kansas really undertakes to tell us that in the fourth line of this sentence "like kind of property" relates to passengers. I did suppose there was eternally this distinction of persons and property; that if passengers are persons, property is not persons and can not be passengers. That is all there is in that sentence. I would whip my boy of twelve years if he did not understand all that sentence means.

I now take the next sentence; and I agree that this next sentence need not be here. But let us see what there is in it. What is this second sentence?

But this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

This does not authorize them to do it. Suppose they charge 1 cent a ton less on freight, and 1 cent less on a passenger fare; there is no trouble or difficulty.

They are not authorized by the bill to charge as much. Does anybody question what that sentence means, or would anybody raise such a question if it stood alone?

Then I take the third sentence; and what is that?

Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do you understand that this investigation, the fixing of a lower rate, &c., will be before or after the transportation?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Why, after the investigation, of course, for transportation thereafter, because it reads here that "after investigation by the commission" the carriers may be permitted to do this.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is, investigation of the circumstances.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Investigation of the circumstances and conditions. I believe I would whip a twelve-year-old boy that went to school to me, or who used to go to school to my friend from Michigan, if he did not understand that sentence standing alone. Now, if all these three sentences are easily understood, each by itself, put them together, and can they not be understood?

Mr. Speaker, the country is demanding something at our hands. We can not restrict the powers of the Fiftieth Congress, which may be called together after the 4th of March next. But all good laws have always been brought about by amendment after amendment. If we never take the first step we shall never get anywhere; and I take upon myself all the responsibility which may be thrown upon me for my voice and my vote in favor of this measure.

The great defender of the people's rights in this country is publicity; and under the provisions of this bill, schedules, rates of freight, and passenger traffic—all these things are to be spread abroad in the light of day, so that the people may know what they have to pay. Public opinion in this country is the king, thank God; and for a proper result from the agitation of this subject we are willing to wait. Louis Kossuth said, years ago, there is no difficulty to him who wills; and if this Congress wills to exercise the power which a hundred years ago was conferred upon it by the Constitution, I believe there is sense enough and wisdom enough in America—if we have it not, our successors will have it—to properly enforce this provision and give the relief to which sixty millions of American citizens are entitled. Sir, I am done. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. McADOO. Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate it has been often said by members who have engaged in the discussion that, while they did not like this bill or many of its provisions, they were going to vote for it, and that they would do so in response to the demands of a public opinion which they could not understand—that from their point of view the bill was so vicious and so impracticable that they could not understand the public opinion which demanded it and compelled them to vote for it while their reason and their judgment failed to approve.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the wonder is that this public opinion has not found definite expression in this House before this time. The people on this question are right. When the steam railway and the locomotive became established facts, the people of the infant republic with a great and comparatively undeveloped continent before them, began to encourage railroad building. Not only was there no State or Federal restraint by law upon railroads, but special immunities, exemptions, bounties, subsidies and land grants were given to those corporations which citizens in other enterprises generally did not enjoy. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, railroad building was encouraged to the extent of granting to the railroads among other favors exemption from local taxation, thus implanting a train of evils which has injured our people and damaged our State, and done gross injustice to its cities.

While to them was given all the protection which the other properties in the State enjoyed and all the benefit of government, they had also special immunities and exemptions which other citizens did not possess, and did not share in the equal burdens of government. And so it was throughout the whole country; local bounties, State bounties, national bounties, land grants, subsidies, exemptions, and favors were given to the railroad corporations. Under this encouragement and fosterage by local, State, and national Legislatures, without any attempt at restraint or regulation, the great railroad system of the United States grew up and waxed strong, until the people find themselves confronted by a confederacy of great corporations which wrests from them annually nearly eight hundred millions of dollars by way of tariff for the transportation of persons and property. The receipt of this vast sum into different treasuries it is true, but all of which can unite for self and mutual interest, creates a power almost as great as the Government itself. Unrestrained by legislative enactment how feeble the ordinary citizen to contend for his rights against this tremendous power, how impotent the State to check its influence in the selection of its officers and its voice in her councils!

These immense sums being poured annually into the treasuries of these powerful companies, presented a temptation greater than human nature can bear. The railway companies proved no exception to the general rule, and in many of the States of this Union they soon became more powerful than the people themselves, so far as the selection of the Federal and State governments and the making of their laws were concerned, and against this the people rebelled; and hence there was introduced into Congress what has been popularly known for twelve years past as the Reagan bill.

Mr. Speaker, that bill was the voice of public sentiment—the earnest and solemn protest of the people against railroad domination and injustice. That bill was backed by the almost universal sentiment of the great majority of the conservative people of the United States, outside of railroad and allied circles, who demanded that the Federal Government should exercise its constitutional power to restrain and regulate these tremendous corporations in their interstate commerce, which affects so powerfully the happiness, the liberties, the welfare, the prosperity, and the property of sixty millions of people, and the development and advancement of this great land. It was a wise thing, probably, on the part of Congress that no hasty legislation took place under the powerful impetus of this indignant public opinion. The subject has been discussed both in and out of Congress, in the press, in the forum, and, I presume, in the pulpit. Every Representative on this floor for the past ten or twelve years has been inundated with literature on the railroad question—petitions, resolutions, memorials, protests, and essays—and this bill which we are considering to-day, with all the imperfections which it may contain, is the result of the mature deliberation of the country, both in and out of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, there are some features of this bill with which I do not agree—as for instance the vicious commission—but forbid it gods and men that I, speaking for myself, should take the responsibility of voting against a bill which inhibits the nefarious system of "pooling" and "rebates" and discriminations in favor of long hauls against short ones, and which compels the railroads of the United States to furnish to their patrons stable bills of rates, advertised so that he who runs may read! Why, Mr. Speaker, if there is to-day in the United States any leaven of imported or domestic anarchy, I believe firmly and conscientiously that it has been encouraged and developed by these combinations of capital in these powerful confederacies known as railroad and steamship pools, and coal pools, and grain pools, and cattle pools, and land pools, and all the varied pools that constitute the great dismal swamp of injustice and monopoly. These combinations squeeze and grind labor and suppress with iron hand competition. How indignant they become at labor strikes! And yet they themselves have been on strike against honest government and just dealing for these many painful years; and now that some slight legal restraint is to be placed on them, they rend the heavens with woeful lamentations and prophesies of national ruin.

What does a "pool" mean to us who live in the East? It means that five or six men who control these great trunk lines which traverse the continent can, by meeting and confederating together, fix the price of the necessaries of life, which you in the West raise to be consumed by our people in the East. What makes up the price of a barrel of flour in New Jersey? The cost of its production on the fertile fields of Iowa or Illinois, and added to that the cost of transportation, not fixed by natural competition, but fixed by the almost imperial fiat of the railroad pools. So that these men not alone control the cost of transportation, but by their confederacy and agreement fix and determine the price of the very necessaries of life to those who consume them.

I well remember that when this measure was up in the Forty-eighth Congress the gentleman from Iowa, who has just sat down, replying to some observations which I had made in advocacy of it, and speaking as against the long and short haul provisions, said that I had given him the key to his position, which was in opposition to that feature of the bill; that I, representing an Eastern community, was in favor of the long haul as against the short haul, so that the measure might benefit the farmers of the East, while it would work injury to those of the West. The gentleman has lived, I think, to regret his mistake; and while his colleague may or may not be consistent, as he contends, the gentleman has lived to learn that he did not then possess all the wisdom on this question. The people of Iowa evidently favor this law.

Now, I say to the gentleman to-night that we of the East are as much concerned in this question as he of the West, because the cost of food which is consumed in the East is increased by the cost of transportation; so that if the result of this bill should be to make more costly the long haul, it would make more expensive to my people the food which his people produce on the boundless prairies of Iowa.

There has been another argument adduced here in opposition to the bill. Gentlemen say, "Why do you treat railroad property as you do not treat other property? If you can interfere in this arbitrary and bold method with railroads, why do you not interfere with the grocery business or the coal business?" Mr. Speaker, the railroads do not stand in the same position to legislation as do other branches of business. The railroads of the United States are public highways; they are the people's highways; and the Legislature of the people has absolute and sovereign control over the highways which they themselves have created.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor this afternoon to submit a few observations indicating the reasons why I felt constrained to vote for this bill, notwithstanding some of its provisions. I was followed by some gentlemen who took occasion to criticise that position, and to treat it as inconsistent that I should at the same time criticise some of the provisions of the measure and also announce my intention to vote for the report of the conference committee. My opposition to this bill, Mr. Speaker, is very analogous to what the late lamented Hosea Bigelow described as the position of his Presidential candidate in regard to the Mexican war. His position was defined in the following words:

As for the war, I go agin it;
That is to say, I sort o' do;
By which I mean that being in it,
The best way is to fight her through.

That illustrates my position with regard to this bill. I am against certain of its provisions; but I think that, altogether, "being in it," having the situation now in our control, the best way is to "fight it through."

My distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] whom I do not now see in his seat, though he was here a few moments since, endeavored to-day with his usual eloquence and persuasiveness to convince the House that we might safely vote against this conference report, and thereby send the bill back to the conference committee with some vague, indefinite expectation that they would strike out the obnoxious fourth section and bring us back a bill for which we could all vote.

Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman can undertake to guarantee to me that this bill shall come back to us from the conference committee with the obnoxious fourth section stricken out, I for one shall most gladly vote to non-concur. But apprehending as I do that if we reject this report and send the bill again into conference, we shall never see it again in this Congress, or any other, I feel constrained to adhere to the position I announced this afternoon, that having it now in our power, I prefer that we should now and here make this the law rather than risk any uncertainties of the future. Mr. Speaker, in the language of Holy Writ, "Now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation" for us upon this question.

Another gentleman who has addressed the House this evening, my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], seems to be apprehensive that this great commission is to be a political machine. Now, it is my experience that you can not find five men in the United States of the standing, of the caliber, the intelligence that these five men must be, who do not belong to some political party. These commissioners will belong to some political party; and the only question for us is, whether they shall all belong to one party, or whether we shall require that the members of this commission shall be of mixed politics, so that one may be offset against another.

One gentleman here to-night declares in favor of a political commission, because it will carry with it political responsibility.

I prefer, however, to have a commission which shall be mixed so the responsibility shall not all rest on one.

But, Mr. Speaker, I should like, if time permitted, to recur to some of the objections of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] in his speech, yesterday. He fears the commission is going to bring with it the great bugbear of centralization and corruption, that these five men cannot be trusted, that they will be subject to corruption.

Why now, in God's name, how does this come about? We elect one man President of the United States, and put him at the head of the Government. We trust him with all the executive power of these sixty millions of free people. We do not apprehend he is going to be corrupted, that he is going to be carried off his feet by the railroad power. In the Supreme Court we confer upon the judges the power to pass upon the rights of citizens, and we are not afraid the Supreme Court is going to be corrupted. We are not afraid of the centralization of power. Here is a commission to be appointed, and we have no more reason to apprehend they will be subject to corruption.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the oppression, discrimination, and small, mean practices carried on by railroads all over this country have been so varied and so great as to reach nearly every kind of business, so that there is hardly a town so small upon the line of a railroad which does not contain in its history the same story of rapacity and brutal force. How many are the towns to-day carrying bonds which were authorized for the building or extension of some great railroad line, whose coming was to mark a new prosperity for all the country round about. How many citizens in those towns to-day look in vain for some appropriate terms in which to characterize their indignation as they see other towns near them—which did not contribute one cent to the building of the line of railroad, and which were, in fact, built up themselves because of the railroads—as they see these towns discriminated in favor of by the railroads both in the way of freight and passengers.

Yet as I speak these words I doubt not it stirs up the hot blood of honest indignation in the heart of many a man, as he takes this general statement and makes the particular application.

It is the old fable of the viper brought back to life in the bosom of the farmer, turning with its new given vitality to sting its benefactor. The people have about given up hopes of favorable legislation in this matter, and well they might despair.

How often have they appealed to State Legislatures for relief, only to be met there by the powerful influences the railroads know so well how to use, until they naturally have hailed the appearance of this bill—before they had read it—as a step in a direction leading to emancipation from the bonds of oppression. But alas, it is the same old story. The lawyers have again outwitted the people.

There is the sound of trumpets, the red fire burns with great brilliancy, the players strut about in heroic costumes; but when the audience disappear and the actors, stripped of disguises, come out of the side door, nudging each other at their success in once more fooling the people, we recognize the same old farce. The bill pretends to befriend the people—I believe it helps the railroads, or, at all events, it hurts the people. As one wise railroad man expresses it, "It may diminish our gross receipts, but our net income will not suffer." Railroad lawyers have been at work here, and the result appears in a bill which does not do what it says it will, but which, under specious terms, the meaning of which no men have yet agreed upon, in the place of offering bread to a starving people, it mocks at their hunger and offers a stone; and more than that, it seeks to cram it down the people's throats and to convince them it is bread.

I am amazed that this bill should seem to have even the promise of success, and the only explanation is the fact of the unanimity with which all recognize the necessity of doing something to bring the railroads under control leads them to accept anything which strings words together under a title which sounds large and sonorous. One can not check the swollen stream which has overflowed its banks and is carrying devastation and ruin in its path by reading an essay on the proper construction of dikes and dams. Practical work is needed, work the nature of which every one understands, and which is directed immediately, and at once, to the work in hand. Something of this sort we needed here; but after years of preparation and an immense amount of intellectual effort, something has been produced which boards of trade and other organizations, equipped by training and education to pass almost infallibly upon practical questions of business, say they have thought over and studied out, and, if they understand, it means either one of two things—and some think one thing and some another.

Now, I wanted to vote for some measure such as this, because, as I said at the beginning, I do think there have been reasonable grounds given for this general uprising of the people against the arbitrary and overbearing treatment they have received from the railroads.

Invariably clinging to the strict technicality of the law, these arrogant corporations, some of them, in the pride of their ill-gotten gains, in the superior position which their vast funds afford to prevent the poor people from successfully engaging with them in litigation, have stood in jeering and taunting attitudes and coolly asked the people "what they were going to do about it." It did seem as if the day had come when some legislation defining the relative positions of servant and master could be attempted.

But in some way as soon as the effort seems likely to succeed an extraordinary activity is manifested, and its practical result presents this law which an all-gifted Providence may translate, but which poor humanity, as manifested in this Congress, has as yet been unable to agree upon. I shall therefore, in the interest of my own people, vote against this bill, which will bring no relief to them or to others, in my judgment.

We have all laughed over the ridiculous position of the nervous man who was sorely distressed by a barking dog belonging to one of his neighbors, and whose vocal villainies were worse on cold nights. One specially cold winter night, when the mercury hovered about zero and a regular northwester was blowing, this dog commenced his barking. Filled with a holy rage the nervous man rushed out of doors in his nightgown, and was discovered by his wife holding the dog around the corner, in the freezing wind. "What in the world are you doing?" said his wife. "Trying to freeze the confounded dog," replied the husband.

Now, I don't feel that we are called upon to punish ourselves by standing out in zero weather, with insufficient clothing to try to freeze out the dog. What I mean is this: In my judgment, we are asked to pass this bill because we shall bring the railroads, these great interstate roads, under some restraint, even if we do it at the risk of ruining the farmer, great and small, in the far West. To be a little more explicit, by far the greater part of our increased export business during the last ten or twenty years has been brought about by large product of breadstuffs. The beneficent operations of the homestead act, the rapid settling up of those great plains and tracts of public lands in the extreme West, have been accomplished by the fact that it was possible for the farmer to market his grain or cattle and secure an immediate return—not always, I am sure, all he should have, but he has been able to market his crop, and the "long haul" business has helped him out.

Whether it has been an injury to the intermediate man or not we can only answer in the fact that he has prospered, in the mean while; at all events, his farming lands have appreciated in value steadily, and he is to-day in far better circumstances than he was ten years ago. I refer now to the man living at the intermediate point. It can not be that the "long haul" can pay the price of the "short haul," as this bill means, in practice without destroying the business and bringing disaster to the farmer, preventing the further development of the land, and bringing in its train a long series of misfortunes to the nation. I have seen no petitions of labor organizations upon this question, and yet I doubt not if they gave this question that far-reaching and far-seeing thought given to other matters—if they got to the very bottom, and saw the actual application—they would deluge this body with petitions in opposition to a measure so directly aimed at the poor farmer, who is the least able to help himself. Hear what one of the leading newspapers says upon this very point:

Another thing to be considered is the general derangement of Western business that would necessarily result from the contemplated readjustment of rates. If the readjustment could be made once for all, business might soon be accommodated to the change, and no great harm might be done. But that would be impossible. The effects of so great a change as would necessarily have to be made can not be clearly foreseen. No one can tell how deeply the measure would affect farming interests, the settlement of the country, and in consequence, not only the railroads but all business interests in the West. Changes in rates would therefore have to be tentative, and frequent alterations would, no doubt, have to be made, every one of which would increase the business derangement and confusion. * * * It is apparent from what has been said that the consequences of the adoption of the haul clause have been but very imperfectly foreseen, while they have hardly been considered at all by the people most deeply interested—the farmers of the West. If Congress is going to pass the pending bill—and there seems to be little room for doubt about that—it will do wisely to submit the haul question to the commission for investigation and report, and for the present stop just there.

I have spoken thus far simply of the bearing upon the extreme Western farmer; but there is another section of the country which would most surely suffer from the passage of the bill, and that is the great South and Southwest. Every year, nearly, since the war has shown great activity throughout portions of the South, and a most commendable intention and purpose to develop the great resources of that country. Take the item of cotton alone, that great staple, and note the increase in acreage:

Acreage in cotton.

Season.	Texas.	Arkansas.
	Acres.	Acres.
1871–'72	774,806	597,857
1872–'73	914,296	693,512
1873–'74	1,097,122	811,409
1874–'75	1,119,064	722,154
1875–'76	1,483,500	1,133,000
1876–'77	1,483,500	1,133,000
1877–'78	1,706,025	1,189,650
1878–'79	1,808,386	1,165,857

1882–'83	2,810,113	1,110,790
1883–'84	3,034,922	1,188,545

Here is the percentage of gain in thirteen years: In Texas, $291\frac{7}{10}$ per cent., or $22\frac{9}{10}$ per cent. per annum; in Arkansas, $215\frac{9}{10}$ per cent., or $16\frac{6}{10}$ per cent. per annum.

And this cotton, too, is of high grade, especially adapted to making fine yarns, such as are usually spun in New England.

This is certainly a wonderful exhibit in development, but it is actual, and the growth entirely healthy, and, considering the vast extent of territory still in those two States, still waiting this active development, there is every reason to think the rates of increase will not diminish unless a change in the tariff should ruin the markets now so near at hand, and thus check the growth so advantageous and bringing so many direct and indirect blessings.

This cotton must, for a long time at least, seek a market at long distances, for the Southern cotton mills use local cotton of shorter staple, well adapted for coarse yarns, while the New England mills are abandoning these coarser goods for finer yarns, requiring more labor to the pound of cotton; and five mills which I could name in my own district consumed 63,000 bales of this Texas and Arkansas cotton last year, and unless prevented will yearly increase on that amount. It is well for our Southern statesmen to remember that this market for cottons at the North is a monopoly, while in England they meet the competition of India and Egypt.

Bombay and Alexandria shipped to Europe in 1884 1,731,057 bales.

The New England cotton manufacturers are the sure customers of the Southern planter, the Texas cattle raiser, and the Western wheat-grower. Can a more ideal copartnership be found?

Why I have said so much in detail with reference to this cotton industry is on account of the fact that we at the North receive the cotton from all interior parts by rail, and in this copartnership interest we must oppose legislation which is prejudicial to either.

The cotton grower adjacent to the Mississippi and other large rivers naturally and cheaply seek New Orleans as the shipping port, but at varying distances back from the river the railroads compete successfully for the business, their cars unloading directly, without trans-shipment, in the yards of the cotton mills in New England, and without breaking bulk.

Cotton, going to New Orleans and other seaports, destined for the North, is reshipped both at the Southern and Northern seaport, which is both objectionable, for obvious reasons, and is costly. If an additional cost is to be placed upon cotton from its inland ports, so-called, who is to suffer the cost? Because cotton from Northern Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia has to be freighted to New Orleans, it does not follow that it will command the extra freight cost. It must be sold in competition with all other cotton escaping this charge. The planter in the end must lose this extra sum, whatever it amounts to. I have these figures and facts from a most reliable source, and I commend them to the intelligent study, in the obvious lessons they teach, of those members most interested in this cotton industry, that they may consider whether they care to commit themselves to the support of a measure the additional burdens of which must of necessity be borne by their own people.

In New England, from our geographical situation, the barrenness of soil, the stern seasons and rigorous climate, we are restricted in our sources of livelihood. Neither the agriculturist nor the miner need fear competition from us; but as a vast, busy manufacturing community, furnishing a great army of intelligent working men and women, absorbing a large portion of the products of the South and West, and returning such as we do not need, again in manufactured form—as such a community we feel keenly, in our peculiar conditions, any material changes in values.

Our people work hard, are thrifty, intelligent, and happy, but it has only been by certain little discriminations (in name only) in aid of our chief shipping port that we have the export business which we now enjoy.

To pass this bill would be to put us at very great disadvantage, and while I am not prepared to go so far as some and see in imagination the yawning walls marking in desolate ruin the spot where once stood thriving and populous factories, yet I must say, as a bit of practical experience, that the result of any shrinking of values is quite likely to show itself first upon the poor people; and in their interest, and because I believe their welfare is unmistakably identified with the growth and development of our industries, I must protest against the passage of this measure, destined as it is to work an injury against New England and New England interests. There is not a burden under which our people suffer which will be removed by this bill.

The railroads in the States may go on in the same arbitrary manner, while there will be added burdens in the increased cost of living, which will make life harder to every man, woman, and child. This seems to be a sufficient reason for opposing this bill. Should it be proposed to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the fourth section, I should certainly vote for such a measure. In the shape in which it now appears I vote against it without the slightest hesitation.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I have been able to secure, it is impossible to analyze the various provisions of this bill. The obligation, however, to do this is mitigated by the railroad corporations affected by these provisions, for these corporations, by their attorneys and representatives, seem to object seriously but to two sections—the fourth and the fifth.

The fourth section makes it unlawful for any interstate railroad company to charge greater compensation for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

The statement of this proposition would seem to convey its own argument. It is obvious that the carrier can charge as much under that clause for 10 miles as for 100, or indeed 1,000, but it shall not charge more. In view, however, of the fact that cases may arise where this prohibition may work a hardship, it is provided that the commission may, after investigation, confer authority to charge less for a longer than for a shorter haul.

By this proviso, it seems to me, the danger of hardship and injustice to the corporations is as fully guarded against as human foresight can provide.

It is true that the bill requires that all charges shall be reasonable and just, but that is now the common law of the land in relation to common carriers.

The fifth section prohibits pooling arrangements between competing railroads. The companies object to that provision, because, they say, if they are not permitted to make such arrangements they will cut rates and ruin each other. Well, the preservation of the railroad companies from the consequences of foolish competition with each other is not the object of this bill. The object of this bill is to protect the public, from whom the corporations derive their franchises, from the absolute elimination of competition, and to preserve so far as practicable a proper and healthful competition. There is competition in everything else. In every industry, in every branch of business, in the struggle of bank corporations, coal companies, and even in petroleum—for the Standard Oil Company has not yet entirely absorbed its rivals—there is competition.

But the railroad companies say, "Oh, don't subject us to the necessity of competing with each other. If you do, we will cut each other's throats."

It is a strange position to take. Having conferred upon them the right of eminent domain by the State, in order that they may serve the public and promote the public welfare, it is indeed singular that they should claim immunity from the necessity of competition, when that necessity rests on all other interests and works in many cases disasters quite as severe as those which occasionally fall on the railroads.

The many provisions of this bill which prohibit drawbacks, rebates, and kindred discrimination, preferences and partiality to shippers, secret arrangements and understandings—all forbidden now by the common law, but so expensive and difficult of ascertainment by common-law methods as to be practically beyond redress—are so thoroughly right and just that nobody has had the temerity to object to them.

It is, however, but a tentative measure. It is largely experimental. Nobody wishes to do anything that will cripple or injure the railroad corporations of the country. They are the great arteries of our commerce. Day by day and year after year other modes of transportation are surrendering to them. Their rights should be scrupulously regarded and protected. But there is no conflict between the rights of the public and the rights of these companies. Each can be maintained, and neither the public nor the transportation companies need suffer if exact and equal justice be done in the transactions between them.

I believe this bill will develop strong tendencies toward the desired fair play, and I therefore cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. BURROWS. In the discussion of any proposition it is well to eliminate from the debate all questions about which there is no serious controversy. This is a bill to regulate commerce among the States. The power of Congress in the matter is unquestioned. It is conferred in express terms by the Constitution of the United States, and is confirmed by a long and unbroken line of judicial determination. Commerce among the States must be regulated by the National Government or not at all.

The question, therefore, is not one of power, but one of expediency. First, is there a necessity of invoking national authority; and if such necessity exists, in what manner shall it be exercised? The necessity for exercising national control is conceded by everybody.

I hold in my hand an indictment, formulated by the Cullom committee against the railways of the United States, which is said to embody the charges preferred by the people. It is as follows:

THE CAUSES OF COMPLAINT AGAINST THE RAILROAD SYSTEM.

The complaints against the railroad system of the United States expressed to the committee are based upon the following charges:

1. That local rates are unreasonably high, compared with through rates.
2. That both local and through rates are unreasonably high at non-competing points, either from the absence of competition or in consequence of pooling agreements that restrict its operation.
3. That rates are established without apparent regard to the actual cost of the service performed, and are based largely on "what the traffic will bear."
4. That unjustifiable discriminations are constantly made between individuals in the rates charged for like service under similar circumstances.
5. That improper discriminations are made between articles of freight and branches of business of a like character, and between different quantities of the same class of freight.
6. That unreasonable discriminations are made between localities similarly situated.
7. That the effect of the prevailing policy of railroad management is, by an elaborate system of secret special rates, rebates, drawbacks, and concessions, to foster monopoly, to enrich favored shippers, and to prevent free competition in many lines of trade in which the item of transportation is an important factor.
8. That such favoritism and secrecy introduce an element of uncertainty into legitimate business that greatly retards the development of our industries and commerce.
9. That the secret cutting of rates and the sudden fluctuations that constantly take place are demoralizing to all business except that of a purely speculative character, and frequently occasion great injustice and heavy losses.
10. That, in the absence of national and uniform legislation, the railroads are able by various devices to avoid their responsibility as carriers, especially on shipments over more than one road, or from one State to another, and that shippers find great difficulty in recovering damages for the loss of property or for injury thereto.
11. That railroads refuse to be bound by their own contracts, and arbitrarily collect large sums in the shape of overcharges in addition to the rates agreed upon at the time of shipment.
12. That railroads often refuse to recognize or be responsible for the acts of dishonest agents acting under their authority.
13. That the common law fails to afford a remedy for such grievances, and that in cases of dispute the shipper is compelled to submit to the decision of the railroad manager or pool commissioner, or run the risk of incurring further losses by greater discriminations.
14. That the differences in the classifications in use in various parts of the country, and sometimes for shipments over the same roads in different directions, are a fruitful source of misunderstandings, and are often made a means of extortion.
15. That a privileged class is created by the granting of passes, and that the cost of the passenger service is largely increased by the extent of this abuse.
16. That the capitalization and bonded indebtedness of the roads largely exceed the actual cost of their construction or their present value, and that unreasonable rates are charged in the effort to pay dividends on watered stock and interest on bonds improperly issued.
17. That railroad corporations have improperly engaged in lines of business entirely distinct from that of transportation, and that undue advantages have been afforded to business enterprises in which railroad officials were interested.
18. That the management of the railroad business is extravagant and wasteful, and that a needless tax is imposed upon the shipping and traveling public by the unnecessary expenditure of large sums in the maintenance of a costly force of agents engaged in a reckless strife for competitive business.

That indictment, as will be seen, consists of eighteen counts, and I venture the assertion that if the managers of the railroads of the country were called upon to plead to this indictment, there is scarcely a single count to which they would not be compelled to enter the plea of guilty. The evidence in support of these charges is too voluminous for citation and so convincing that it can not leave a reasonable doubt as to their truth. The wrong, then, is confessed; the power to remedy conceded. The bill seeks to apply the remedy. The method suggested is criticised in only two or three particulars. There is no serious objection to any other provisions of the bill.

Let us examine these points of controversy. By some the commission is objected to. I do not care to follow the many objections urged against the commission. I am content to know that the method of exercising control of railroads through the instrumentality of a commission has been tested, tried, and approved in this and foreign countries.

It is not only a method adopted in Europe in the supervision of railroads, but of the forty-six States and Territories of the United States thirty have undertaken the regulation of State commerce carried on upon railways, and in the exercise of that power twenty-five of these States have employed the instrumentality of a commission, and only five States which have made any effort to regulate their domestic commerce have dispensed with a commission. This method has, therefore, the advantage of trial and, in the main, approval.

I think, therefore, that the creation of a commission is a very commendable feature of this bill, and it gives play to some of its features or provisions, particularly of the fourth section, which if rigidly enforced might produce commercial shock—possibly commercial disaster.

The long and short haul provided for in the fourth section is objected to as working a hardship upon through shippers. Let us examine this a moment. The bill does not undertake to fix through or local rates for any road. It is not a cast-iron arrangement. It leaves the railway managers perfectly free to fix their own through charges, governed only by the common law that they shall be reasonable. Fix your own through rates, it says to the railroads, but with this simple understanding that these through rates shall be a guide for and govern your shorter haul.

If there was but a single railroad line running from Chicago to New York there would be no objection to this provision of the bill. In such case, there being no competition, the shipper at Chicago would be charged a reasonable rate, say $25, for carrying a horse, we will say, from Chicago to New York, a reasonable and fair rate for that distance, and a shipper at South Bend under this bill in such case would be charged not to exceed $25 for a like service. Why, Mr. Fink himself testified before the Cullom committee that this provision is substantially adopted by the railroads in practice. Here is what he says:

The local charges can always be properly regulated when proper through tariffs are maintained; hence the first object should be to secure the maintenance of properly-adjusted through tariffs that are reasonable to the public and to the railroads. This done, there will be no difficulty in adjusting local tariffs and preventing unjust discrimination.

It is a rule generally adopted by all railroads to properly adjust local tariffs to the through tariffs when the latter are reasonable and fairly remunerative. For example, the tariffs of the Pennsylvania Railroad are so arranged that no higher charge is made from any station east of Pittsburgh to Philadelphia than from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, nor from any station this side of Chicago than from Chicago. That is a rule generally adopted by all roads.

But now another question arises in this problem; competition comes in at Chicago and there are two or more roads instead of one, and here is just where the difficulty comes in. By reason of this competition at Chicago the rate fixed for the carriage of a horse in the case supposed, from that city to New York, is cut down to $15, while the rate at South Bend for the same service is maintained at $25, and for the reason that there is no competition at South Bend.

Now the shipper at South Bend says that "if $15 for the carriage of a horse from Chicago to New York is a reasonable and fair rate—and it must be because you have adopted it—then the charge of $25 from South Bend to New York for like service is an extravagant and extortionate charge." If $15 is a reasonable paying rate from Chicago to New York, then certainly $15 is a paying rate from South Bend to New York. This bill steps in an enforces the reasonable rate from South Bend to New York, and gives the shipper the benefit of the rate from Chicago established by wholesome competition.

Now another step. Competition becomes very sharp at Chicago, and the shipper pays but $10 for carrying his horse from Chicago to New York; and it is conceded on all hands that that pays simply the cost of shipment and not a dollar of profit. What does the railroad management then do? They turn round and charge the loss of $5 to the shipper at South Bend, and make him pay, instead of $15, $20 for the carriage of his horse.

Here is a double wrong. The charge from Chicago to New York is unreasonably low, and the charge from South Bend to New York is unreasonably high. But the railroad management must not suffer, and so they charge the loss upon the shipper at South Bend. Upon what principle of law, morals, or ethics must the shipper at South Bend pay the freight of the shipper's horse from Chicago? Again, it is said water competition comes in, and the Canadian system of roads, and other circumstances, which force low rates for through freight, which ought not to be made the basis for the shorter hauls. All these matters are regulated by the proviso in this section. That proviso is inserted for the very purpose of giving the commission discretion in all such cases. Let me read section 4 and the proviso thereto:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

It is clear to my mind that under this proviso the commission will be fully empowered to relieve from any hardship imposed by the long and short haul provision of this section.

The rule adopted in this section is not new. It is embodied in the constitutions of four States of this Union, and in the statutes of Massachusetts.

When the railroad companies come to understand that their short-haul rates are governed by the rate fixed for the through traffic, they will carry competition at competing points only to the limit of reasonably fair compensation.

There is another objection urged against this bill, and that is the provision prohibiting pooling. What is pooling? An eminent authority has defined it in these words:

It is a combination between railways engaged in competitive traffic to maintain rates by suspending competition.

And that is the correct definition. It suspends competition. Well, now, under the operation of this bill, in section 4, the companies need no such provision as pooling to maintain rates. They must maintain reasonable through rates as a matter of self-protection. As soon as the railroads understand that their charge for a short haul is governed by the through rates they will not put their through charges at a losing rate, but they will make the through rates reasonable and fair; and when they have done that they will maintain those rates, when they understand they can not saddle the loss of an unreasonable cut on the shippers along the line.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. In taking that position, does the gentleman admit that the through rates will be necessarily raised?

Mr. BURROWS. I think possibly so—not necessarily—the bill will prevent the through freight being carried at a loss, and loading the burden of the loss on the shippers along the line, and the shippers along the line ought not to be compelled to carry this burden. The abolition of pooling, in other words, will stop the cutting of through rates, and the railroad companies will be compelled to maintain a fair, reasonable through rate the moment they understand that their local rates must be regulated by the through charge. Now, if pooling was not prohibited the companies would combine and put up the through rates to an exorbitant extent for the very purpose of maintaining charges along the line. Therefore, by abolishing pooling and leaving the fourth section intact you maintain competition for through freight, and insure fair rates all along the line.

Now a word more. These two provisions, the abolition of pooling and the fourth section together will operate as a regulation of this whole matter. With pooling prohibited you have free competition, which will operate to bring the through charges to the lowest point of fair compensation; to prohibit a greater charge for a short than a longer haul operates to prevent cutting through rates below the point of a reasonable charge.

This whole matter will be adjusted with substantial justice to carrier and shipper alike.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. May I be permitted to say just one word more? The chief merit of this bill after all, let me say in conclusion, is to my mind its moderation. It is not a rash measure; it is not an extreme measure; and it is fortunate that this is so. It is well in taking possession of this new field of national occupancy that we move with extreme caution. We are on the border of an unexplored territory and every step is fraught with momentous consequences. Vast interests are involved. In redressing wrongs we must invade no right, but advance with such prudence and consideration that in the end our national domination over this great question will be to all a national blessing. [Applause.]

Mr. ELY. Mr. Speaker, hitherto I have been content to vote on bills not coming from committees of which I am a member before the House without any explanation of my action. It is because I regret exceedingly to vote against the bill now under consideration, but am impelled to do so in the discharge of my duty to the people, that I desire to briefly state my reasons therefor. It has always been my belief that Congress should provide for a wise but firm control of those great instrumentalities of interstate commerce, the railroads. Not that I believe that railroads are public highways in the same sense that ordinary carriage-roads are public highways, but that they embrace the foundation elements of public highways combined with the qualities of a business corporation.

This idea of a railroad corporation makes it necessary, to my mind, that any wise measure of legislative control of railroad operations must not lose sight of those principles of business which, in the nature of things, influence and govern business transactions and inevitably lead to success or failure. Much, therefore, as we may desire to curb the imperiousness and tyranny of railroad officials—and I yield to no man in my earnestness to accomplish that result—great as may be our sense of the wrong done to the people by railroad corporations by their arrogant pretensions to and exercise of arbitrary power, by their greed and avarice, by their unjust discriminations, by their wicked and corrupt combinations with other corporations as wicked and corrupt as themselves, we can not wisely adopt any measure of relief which will conflict with well-recognized business laws.

Business is governed by laws as universal and invisible as is the physical world by its laws. Whenever those laws are violated the people suffer. Railroads constitute a momentous factor in the business of the country, and if they are compelled by an act of Congress to transact their business on incorrect business principles, then all business will suffer, and the injury will fall, not on the railroads, but on the people. The railroads will take care of themselves; never fear about that.

I oppose this bill, first, because it violates sound business principles as I understand them. I should very gladly vote for most of the provisions of this bill. But I cannot give my assent to a method of fixing the compensation for transportation of passengers or property which takes into consideration only one element bearing on that question, and that one an element of lesser importance. Can business operations be measured, as the carpenter measures a board, by a two-foot rule? Shall the question of competition, which enters with gigantic force into all business calculations, be entirely ignored?

Shall the great business interests in the widely separated sections of this country and the plants established at a cost of millions of dollars to promote those interests, by which the interests of the East and of the West are materially promoted—shall these be forgotten? Shall the great export trade so essential to the prosperity of the country not have a voice in this measure? I believe it to be in the interest of all the people of the country that all these elements and many others should be considered in fixing the rates of transportation. Time is not afforded me to discuss this matter, but the discussion of the fourth section of this bill, not only by those who oppose the bill but by those who favor it, clearly shows to my mind that the standard set up in it is inadequate.

The central proposition is so infirm, its foundation is so insecure, that it has been found necessary to surround it with props and stays on every side, and the props and stays are of such a character as to hasten to its fall the structure they were intended to support. As I have witnessed the attacks which have been made on this provision of the bill, and the replies to those attacks, it has seemed to me to be like some building shaken by an earthquake whose tottering walls are supported by pieces of worthless timber. Nobody can tell whether it is safe to pass along the street in front of it or not.

This brings me to my second objection. Nobody knows what the language used in this section means. Attempts have been made by the members of the conference committee and others to define the principal proposition of this section and its collateral supports, but in vain. Only yesterday the gentleman from Iowa inquired of the gentleman from Georgia, a member of the conference committee, whether the word "cases" in the fourteenth line of this section referred to shipments or to roads. The gentleman from Georgia replied that it referred to shipments. The gentleman from Iowa evidently believes that it refers to roads. The gentleman from Georgia is asked to explain and illustrate the provisions of this section so that we can understand it, and he admits his inability to do so. The meaning of every important phrase in this fourth section is incomprehensible even to the members of the committee who reported the bill.

I do not overstate or exaggerate the difficulties which surround every man who undertakes to ascertain the meaning of this section. If the men who used this language do not know what it means how can any third person interpret it? This is the most important section of this bill. It is, in my judgment, utterly unwise to send it, incapable as it is of being understood, to the country, to the courts, to the commission created by this bill. It would lead to endless confusion and litigation, the costs and expense of which would bear heavily on the people. Far better would it be to wait until a bill can be prepared which can at least be understood by its framers.

But it is said pass this bill and take our chances. If it is bad we can hereafter amend or repeal it. Such an idea is a delusion and a snare. Too great interests are at stake. Such a method of legislation is always unwise. Let us at least know, or believe that we know, the meaning of a bill and have faith in its merits before we pass it.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts. I can not resist the impulse to say a word on this subject, notwithstanding I can not hope to add anything to what has been said already in this debate. I hail with joy the immediate prospect of the passage of this bill. I accept it as the assertion of the authority of the Congress of the United States over the great subject of transportation and the railroads that administer it. I believe that if any peril is before the Government it is the danger which may come in the future from those great corporations which deal with immense capital and which control immense interests.

I believe also that we are, as a nation, on the path of empire, and it is the duty of the General Government to take jurisdiction of all these great questions which are so extensive that the States are incompetent to deal with them. And because of the sharp antagonism that must come between capital and labor, between organized capital and the people, I rejoice now to find that after a contest of years this Congress is ready to agree to vote for the passage of a bill which so distinctly and unequivocally asserts the power of the Government over these great railroad corporations; and the bill itself, I submit, is in substance only the bill which has been heretofore proposed embodying the power of the common law in respect to the entire subject and conferring upon a commission to be appointed by the General Government the authority to say what in a given case shall be the rate or what in a given case shall be the duty of the railroad when dealing with its customers.

The fourth section, which has been so severely criticised, is, when you come to examine it, simply a declaration on the part of Congress that a railroad corporation when transporting property shall not charge more for the short haul than for the long haul, and, as an abstract proposition, can the validity of that be doubted? That is, in substance, the declaration of the fourth section, with this further provision, suggested by experience, that while this, as an abstract proposition, appears to be perfectly satisfactory, nevertheless, because of the complications and the infinite variety of elements when you come to deal with a subject of this moment and this extent, the commissioners shall have the discretion in any given case to relax the rigor of the rule if they think the exigency of the case demands such action. That is the whole of it. It is easy to criticise it; it is easy to show that this section lacks the explicitness of an arbitrary rule. But it is not the design of Congress to impose an arbitrary rule.

It is rather the design of Congress to enter upon this subject by making a declaration of what they think is the proper rule to apply, and at the same time, wisely and with the circumspection which the subject demands, conferring upon the commissioners, to whom the whole subject is to be committed, a discretion which shall enable them to do justice in any given case. I go, therefore, for this bill, not believing that it is perfect, but believing that we take a very great step in advance when, by the passage of it, we assert emphatically the duty as well as the authority of the Congress of the United States to deal with the whole subject.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, was recognized, and yielded to Mr. HERMANN.

Mr. HERMANN withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, while at this stage of the discussion I can hope to throw but little additional light on a subject which has been so ably and so exhaustively presented, I am unwilling to permit the occasion to pass without giving some expression of the reasons that will control my vote. That legislation by the General Government is needed to regulate and systematize the railroad traffic of this country so as to remove some of the burdens and complaints of the producing classes is generally conceded; that the discriminations as to freights in the long and short hauls have been found burdensome and oppressive will not be denied; and that what is known as pooling of rates is an unjust and unwarranted exercise of corporate power is asserted to be true.

That the States are powerless to secure full relief is not denied, and if the General Government, in the exercise of its legitimate powers, can do so, why then it should not fail to respond to that very general demand, which, for the last fifteen years, has requested it at the hands of Congress. The public mind, when well informed, is always right. The people desire to be just. And experience has shown they are more disposed to submit to long-continued abuses than to take the necessary steps for their redress. Not so with vast corporate powers, which, having a common interest, immense resources, bring to their command the ablest and most skilled powers of the human mind to do their bidding.

So that individuals, even with the right and the law on their side, find it in many instances, nearly a hopeless task to secure relief from grievances which they may have suffered. I am far from being unmindful of the great blessings secured by the introduction of railroads in any country. Indeed, I am the advocate of any character of roads which may introduce travel and business into any section. The introduction of railway traffic has revolutionized the commerce of the world; it has thrown open the immense wilderness and prairies of the great West, and has been more potent in civilizing and harmonizing our relations with the Indian tribes than all the armies we might have employed to subdue them or missionaries to Christianize them.

It has done as much to bring together the conflicting interests of this great country and cement the bonds of union as any one known cause. And in addition to rapidly transmitting the necessaries of life from one portion of this country to another, it lays at our doors the refreshing fruits of the tropics side by side with the inviting products of the north. The very agitation of the construction of a railroad in any section enhances the value of its lands, and its completion is the occasion of general rejoicing. I would, therefore, be the last to lay ruthless hands upon or unnecessarily embarrass so important an interest. And this feeling, I am confident, is the common sentiment of the American people. States have been impatient to grant them the right of way and even improvident in offering every facility to aid in their construction, while the United States have granted them billions of acres from her public domain and millions upon millions of dollars for their encouragement.

The result is there are 130,000 miles of railway in the United States to-day, and they collect from passengers and freight over $700,000,000 per annum, or twice as much as it takes to run the General Government. These figures I do not claim to be accurate, but are the estimates of gentlemen who have discussed this question, and who, I have every reason to believe, derived them from reliable sources. It will not be denied that vast sums of money have been used by these corporations for the purpose of affecting the legislation of the country, while colossal fortunes have been amassed by individuals at the expense of the toiling million, which surpasses anything in the history of other countries; and their princely estates and lavish displays have done more to produce discontent among the laboring classes of this country than any other cause, except the disregard of personal feelings and individual rights often manifested by the managers of these corporations. All this has occurred while there is no legislation on the part of the General Government to regulate and control them. Whether this law may be perfect or imperfect, it is time that the people, through their representatives, should assert the right to legislate in regard to a matter of such vast moment, and which it is authorized by our organic law to do. Let us leave it to the future to make such changes as the exigencies of the case may require if we can not secure a more perfect law at this time.

Do not misunderstand me. The bill we are now seeking to pass is not a measure originating from public clamor. For years the question has been discussed in both ends of the Capitol; and while bills have passed both Houses upon this subject this conference bill is the only legislation of the character they have been brought into harmonious accord about. Unless positive action is taken at this time the labors of the past will go for naught and the whole subject will be relegated to the uncertain future. The questions now before the House are: Shall the report of the committee be adopted? Is the bill in accordance with the Constitution? Is such a law necessary? Are its provisions just to the people and to the corporate interests they may affect?

If these questions can be answered in the affirmative then our duty as legislators is clear. It can not be seriously insisted that there is any constitutional difficulty in the way. The decisions of the Supreme Court from the days of the celebrated case of Ogden vs. Gibbon up to the present time have been uniform in recognizing the right of Congress to legislate on such subjects, secured by the constitutional provision to regulate commerce between the States. It matters not how commerce may be transported, the doctrine is equally applicable. I am aware that in the earlier discussions upon this subject this power was denied, but in later years, especially in the famous granger cases in Iowa, the Supreme Court of the United States recognized and affirmed that Congress had full power over this subject. So, I may say, this argument is no longer seriously insisted upon. The chief objections now relied upon relate principally to the inexpediency of such legislation, and the injustice that may arise to railroad corporations.

It is urged that in a matter of such vast importance we should move slowly; that every provision of the bill will require to be tested by the Supreme Court; that dire disasters may occur to the country; that railroad stocks will depreciate, and a Pandora's box will be opened upon the country. Rhetoricians recognize that there is no argument so difficult to answer as that of the prophet. What is here stated as an argument against this bill can be urged against all important legislation. The fears of the opponents of this measure have not been sustained so far as their assertions have been tested by the alembic of experience.

American railroad stocks have not depreciated either in Liverpool or New York since it was anticipated that this legislation would take place. On the contrary, greater confidence has been given to railroad securities from the belief that the business will be hereafter conducted on a more stable and legitimate basis, while wild and extravagant schemes will be less favored. It simply provides that all charges shall be reasonable and just. There shall be no discrimination between those having occasion to employ the roads by resorts to special rates, rebate, or other device, but all share alike for the same and contemporaneous service; that no greater compensation, in proportion, be charged for a short than a long haul on the same line and in the same direction, the circumstances and conditions being similar.

In other words, when a car is started at Wilmington in the direction of Richmond, no greater charges shall be allowed, the conditions being similar, on cars taken at intermediate points than on the car which may be started at the terminus. There is a provision of the law that, in special cases, the commissioners provided for under this bill may, upon investigation, relax the rule, provided they do not permit as great a charge for a short as for a long haul. This is believed to be a wise provision, as it permits an exercise of discretion without which, in some peculiar cases, great hardships might result. The bill also provides that schedules of rates shall be printed and posted at all depots and stations for the public inspection, so that every one may be informed as to the rates he is expected to pay. In the same way the fee-bills in the courts of my State are required to be posted on the walls of the court-room for the information of the public.

These are the salient points in which the public is most interested; others are mainly administrative and relate to the manner in which the law shall be carried into effect. A large majority of the States have already legislated for the regulation of commerce within their own boundaries. But, as may be readily seen, such legislation must be confined purely within State limits, for the regulation of interstate commerce is one that is exclusively conferred upon the General Government. Hence, if we refuse to act, the people are left without a remedy. In regard to the effect of the pooling of rates, in the few remarks I have to make I will content myself by calling the attention of the House to only one example, taken from the testimony of Mr. Chittenden, of New York, who was examined before the House Committee on Commerce. He says:

One word further and I have done. This pool commenced in 1877; it was then a pool contract between the four trunk lines centering in New York. It has grown and stretched out its arms and increased, just as an English judge said such contracts would grow and increase, until now it embraces certainly more than forty—that was the last enumeration I had—of the principal railroads of this country. There is in New York city an equipped and organized pool government. It has its executive committee of the trunk lines; its executive committee of the pool, and another executive committee composed of one member from each pooling railroad; it has its board of arbitration, which is intended to take the place of the judiciary; it has its corps of, I do not know how many hundred clerks, an enormous concern, and over it all is the emperor, the commissioner, Mr. Fink, who to-day exercises a power for good or evil over the commerce and products of this country greater not only than that of any of his contemporaries, but greater than any man ever before exerted in the United States of America. He and his imperial organization are as independent of the law as it is possible for man or State to be, and the whole character or contract which binds these forty roads into this one copartnership and confederation, judged by the principles of the common law, is as unlawful and as much against public policy, if we are to accept the declarations of the judges of the common law, as the Louisiana State lottery or any other similar institution which is confessedly without the pale of the common law.

Then why are not the courts open for redress?

They are, but what is the position of a man who undertakes to get redress in these courts? No merchant dares to do it. He can be crushed in his business if he does. The question to-day before this great dry goods trade is, whether or not it is wise, whether they can afford to go into the legal fight and attempt to get these pooling contracts set aside by the courts. No. There is hardly a week passes in the office of any prominent lawyer in New York that this matter is not presented. A merchant comes into the office of his counsel with a claim against a railroad for an overcharge or a denial of some legal right; the lawyer examines it and decides that there is no doubt about the merchant's right to redress. But when it comes to bringing a suit the merchant hesitates—he can not afford to do it. He can not take the risk of doing it, because the railroads have it in their power, at any time, to destroy the business of any man or firm that seeks redress in the courts.

Such combinations of strong men by vast moneyed corporations render utterly nugatory the efforts of individuals to resist them. The annual commerce of this country is estimated at three thousand millions of dollars' worth, three-fourths of which is carried by rail, and the greater part of this is interstate commerce. Now, it is insisted that the public weal imperatively demands that there should be in this, as there is in other governments, all proper legislation to regulate and control this vast and increasing power. It will not only grant greater security to the people but remove much of the clashing and conflict that arise between different rival railroad companies.

It is not unnatural that where such an extraordinary exercise of power has been long enjoyed without interruption that it should view with jealousy any movement looking to its limitation, and therefore be unwilling to submit without complaint to what it may regard as an invasion of its prerogatives. It arises from an anticipation of imaginary evils which may result from public clamor more than actual dangers now in view. We do not fear such results. The common sense of the country may be relied on; the justice of the people is not to be despised. If, at any time, undue prejudices should be excited against this great and beneficial interest the courts are open to appeal, and the able attorneys ever employed by these corporations can always interpose the needful checks against hasty and ill-advised legislation until the sober second thought returns. Hence it is the pocket nerve of the great financial centers has not been and will not be easily alarmed.

I grant a great deal will depend upon the character of the commission. If composed, as I believe it will be, with great care and wisdom, of able, fearless, and incorruptible men, who can not be swayed by any one interest, the happiest results will follow. At all events, not a year will pass before Congress will again be in session, when such modifications of the law can be made as are found necessary, if experience shall have shown that additional legislation is required. All consider that some legislation is necessary. For over fifteen years this question has been thoroughly, ably, and exhaustively considered and discussed by many of the ablest minds of the country, without practical results, while hope has been deferred to a suffering people. Then why longer delay?

Letting I dare not wait upon I would,
Like the poor cat i' the adage.

I have heard no sufficient reason given for such a course, and therefore cheerfully give my support in favor of this pending measure, confident that unless this conference report is concurred in we will accomplish nothing during the remainder of this short session of Congress.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill, because I believe it to be right. I believe it to be the result of long investigation and of the best thought of the country upon the questions involved. I have no intention to detain the House by reviewing the objections to the bill, but I desire, nevertheless, to indicate my reasons for supporting it.

I believe, sir, that the time has come when the interests of all the people of this country, and not of particular localities, are to be consulted. I believe that we should consider this question, not in the interest of any one locality, but in the interest of all the people of this nation. I see no reason why the people of Chicago, Saint Paul, or Cincinnati should enjoy through rates which operate destructively upon the people who live along the line of the railroads east of those points. I see no reason why through rates should be maintained upon the theory, and only upon the theory, to which the gentleman from Michigan has alluded—a system that enables a railroad company to make up for losses on its through rates by charging up those losses upon the men who live along the line, known as the men who are to have the benefit of the short haul.

This fourth section has no terrors for me. I would like to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], who desires to recommit this bill for the purpose of eliminating this section, that I regard it as containing much of the virtue of this bill. This section is not as objectionable as some gentlemen seem to think it; and even if it be objectionable in the light in which they seem to place it, I want members of the House to understand that ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the people who live under this flag and are ruled by the laws we make have an interest with those who are not connected with this long haul; and our votes should be cast so as to protect the interests of the mass and not of the few.

I beg to differ also with other gentlemen who have spoken relative to this fourth section. I say that under this section we shall have competition. The railroads which center at Chicago and the other great cities of the West will still center there after this measure becomes a law. Pooling being prohibited, competition will exist in the future as it has existed in the past.

Nor am I one of those who believe that the railroad companies have been carrying this through freight at a loss. I believe they have made a fair compensation on their through rates, and that their exorbitant dividends have been declared by reason of the extortions to which they have subjected every way shipper.

With reference to this fourth section, a question has been asked as to what is meant by "substantially similar circumstances and conditions." I will give an illustration of the meaning of that language. A man at Chicago ships grain or live stock from that place to Jersey City, which passes by stations in my State. This freight from Chicago is shipped at a rate 50 per cent. less than freight of like circumstances and conditions carried from stations in my State. Yet that freight of the Western shipper, loaded at Chicago, is carried 600 miles farther than the freight carried for my constituents. Now, there are like circumstances and conditions. There is the same character of freight; there is the same character of cars, going over the same line of railroad.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Suppose the Chicago shipper should offer in a single shipment sufficient freight for a thousand cars while your constituent should only offer freight for a single car or a half car. In those cases would there be like conditions?

Mr. GOFF. There might be fifty, a hundred, or a thousand cars leaving Chicago and a much smaller number leaving the station in my State; yet the shipment would be of the same character. The character of the shipment is not determined by the quantity.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I simply wanted to know whether in your opinion that case would present such conditions and circumstances as the commission might take into consideration.

Mr. GOFF. I do not think that the shipment of a thousand cars in the case supposed would afford any reason for a discrimination against my people; and I mean to class in the same category the people of Ohio, and also a portion of the people of Indiana. If such a circumstance could constitute a reason for discrimination, then various shippers in the West would only have to combine, one man taking charge of the shipments of a hundred producers, and sending them in his own name.

And then the railroad company can come down upon the people who live, as I have just illustrated, 500 miles nearer to Jersey City or the Eastern markets and compel them from the sweat of their faces to give all they earn in order to keep up with this unjust discrimination in the distant West.

Now, I make no warfare against the West; I only ask that they shall not send their shipments for less than we send ours.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the great confidence the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] has exhibited as to his ability to construe the fourth section of this bill, without the fear of misleading any one, I will say if I had my way about it I would strike out thewords, in the fourth section, "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

That is the only thing, I am compelled to say, that affords me much concern in this whole bill. I think that is misleading, and I am afraid that there is the cunning hand of the Standard Oil Company in it. This had not occurred to me until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to-day. I believe that he accounted in a very reasonable way for the presence of those words. He charges it upon some friend of the Standard Oil Company, and offers that as a reason why he should vote against the bill. I confess that the gentleman's remarks made a decided impression upon my mind, but I can not abandon my purpose to support the bill even if it be true that this notorious corporation is congratulating itself, even at this moment, on its escape from the requirements of the law.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOFF. Would the circumstances be like circumstances in the case the gentleman from Ohio cited? In other words, would not the commission compel the railroad company, or the shipper, to take into consideration the fact that this company presents its own cars at the time the rate is agreed upon?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think a properly constituted commission, a commission disposed to fairly construe the bill and enforce equality to all concerned, would get out of the difficulty under some of the other provisions of this bill, for it is evident the whole purport and intent of the bill is to secure and maintain equality. But I would not vote against this bill even if I believed the Standard Oil Company had injected these words into it and they were going to inure to its benefit. For I believe by the time the Fiftieth Congress meets to perform its duties that Congress would get the cue and would immediately strike out the clause, and make the Standard Oil Company pay its part of the freightage for the carrying of its goods. It is assumed by the gentleman from Ohio that because that company owns its cars its "circumstances and conditions" are so unlike any other shippers as to leave it beyond the range of the commission's power. Such a narrow construction would divest the commissioners of any authority whatever to act under other sections of the bill to enforce "reasonable rates."

Therefore, while I deprecate the presence of this ugly puzzle in the bill, it does not furnish to my mind an excuse for voting against the report of the conference committee, since we must take it as a whole or get nothing.

I am not to be driven from my support of the bill because of these things. If I could offer an amendment it would be to strike out this clause. Still I believe that notwithstanding all that has been said against it, and notwithstanding all the hypercriticism that we have, for two days, listened to, this is the best bill on the subject that ever appeared before the United States Congress. No man has yet arisen here to contend for a moment that there should not be legislation upon this subject. There are two classes who oppose the bill. These are the men who have such a hatred against the railroads that they will not be satisfied with voting for this bill because they think it will not ruin the railroads. And then there is the other class who believe we should not interfere in any way to regulate the transportation of the country, because they believe, and with good reason, it will certainly break up a system of "brain strikes," to which they think mankind should yield unquestioning submission and pay unceasing homage.

There are those who are so much in favor of railroads that they would let them do just whatever they like with the people; and there are others who hate the railroads so that they will not vote for this bill because they think the time is coming when they can vote for a bill that will destroy the railroads and enable them thus to gratify their revenge. I shall not join either class. I believe in railroads. I have had enough to do with them to know that they may be, yea, that they inevitably must be, an immense power for the weal or woe of mankind. Possessing rights that spring from the sovereignty of the States or the nation, they must be obedient to the purposes of their creation. Wherein they fail, by tricks, by strategems, or by combinations, they should be restrained. To do so it is not necessary to destroy or even to cripple. Let the power remain. It is not dangerous if properly regulated by law. Wise legislation will utilize it all to the good and glory of the country.

It is quite the thing in this debate for gentlemen to say "the bill is not what it should be; it is different from one I could formulate; it is very defective, and I only accept it because I am obliged to or get nothing." Now, I am not so certain that these gentlemen are any of them sure of their ground. To write a bill covering this vexed subject is quite a different task from telling the authors how they might have done it. If pooling and discrimination and rebates and excessive charges for short hauls in the interest of long hauls—are all to be prohibited, who shall say better provisions for all save the latter can be employed than are found in this bill? And if there is to be any yielding whatever to the apprehensions of many commercial men and organizations upon the long and short haul provision, how could a better compromise be constructed or a more rational one than that embodied in the proviso of the fourth section? Barring always the reasonable objection the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has made, and which I join him in, I do not believe there is a gentleman on this floor who could better it.

At so late an hour I will not presume to discuss these several prohibitions at length. It seems to me that every candid mind must, ere this, have concluded that pooling, rebates, and discriminations are, of necessity, in the long run at least, unjust. What is pooling but a combination to prevent freight charges seeking the natural level to which competition brings them? It is manifestly a "brain strike" for the maintenance of high freights. Which is the more reprehensible, a "brain strike," to bull the price of freights, or a "muscle strike," to bull the price of labor? In my opinion it is the former. The former is generally the prompting of avarice; the latter the demand of stern necessity. It is a rule that admits of scarcely an exception that the former is preceded by the latter, with just about the intervening time necessary for a conspiracy to bear its legitimate harvest of evil! Brain strikes are not, it is true, confined to the managers of railroads, nor is this the only direction the laws should look to find, to prohibit, and to punish them; but here their growth and their insolence are so manifest that to longer permit them to escape is the reproach and shame of our time.

Rebates and discriminations are odious anywhere, but in a free republic that boasts, with much reason, of its equal rights and its equal protection to all, they can exist only as skulking criminals, to be condemned and hated by the generous and the just wherever our commerce finds its way. That these twin evils should have been permitted to work their way into our commerce at all is shocking enough; that they should have been allowed so long to poison and debauch our honesty, by the managers of corporations, clothed with law and fostered by the State, is the marvel of marvels! Sir, are we to permit these felons longer to escape, because we are not suited with the "long and short haul" section contained in a bill which to-morrow we are either to pass or indefinitely postpone? For my part I am ready to act.

I shall vote for this bill because it is the best expression of the will of the people we have ever had in this country, and because if there is one subject above all others upon which the people demand legislation this is the subject. I am not here to apologize for the people as some gentlemen think they are called upon to do. They say their own judgment tells them they should vote against the bill, but the people tell them they should vote for it.

Ah, gentlemen, I have more confidence in the American people than to believe that, after such earnest consideration as they have given this great subject, nothing has been evolved worthy of being crystalized into law. The people are right in demanding legislation.

There is no occasion for panic, nor will the danger of one be so much enhanced by this legislation as by the racket that has preceded it. The powers of the commission are ample both to grant equity and enforce law. They are to be so nearly balanced in politics as to be a constant guard against wielding their power to partisan ends. By the very nature of their position they will become cautious and conservative, and yet the immense responsibility of their trust must, as it seems to me, induce a high purpose and an honest determination to work out beneficent results to the people and the railroads as well. Taking all these things into consideration and believing as I do not only that we can not do better this session, but that if we pass this bill we are doing well I shall give it my vote.

Now, sir, realizing as I do that it is not proper for me to detain the House at this time at any great length, and having, I hope, some mercy on the reporters, I yield the floor.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That might not take so long for you to ask as me to answer. It is now nearly eleven o'clock, and after so long a day's labor I must not impose upon the reporters by speaking beyond my time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, I shall give my vote for the conference report on the bill under consideration, and the reasons I have to offer for so doing are:

1. The legislation proposed, and which promises to be enacted into law, is a step, the first step in fact, that Congress has been able to take in the direction of the control of the very important question of interstate commerce—a question that has been growing in importance every year since railways as a means of transportation for freights began to ask for public patronage. For more than twenty-five years of this period railways claimed the right, by virtue of their corporate powers, to charge such rates as they might think best. They denied the right of the Government to interfere in behalf of the public; they claimed that to competition, and to it alone, should be left the determining of rates.

If no competing lines of railway existed, then competition with water ways and other existing methods should of right constitute the regulator, and the only regulator, of freights. In this position they intrenched themselves and resorted to the courts for defense. The public, on the other hand, while acknowledging that railways had come just in time to rapidly open for settlement regions that otherwise must have waited for the old-time slow occupancy of the pioneer. Right royally have railways performed that work. Having lived in the midst of this wonderful change, we do not realize what railways have done. They have made this country what it is to-day—greater in population than any in Europe save one, Russia, and the acknowledged rival of England in everything that constitutes national greatness.

Sir, I hazard nothing in saying that the railways of the country made it possible for the Grand Army of the Republic to put down the rebellion. The people of this country recognize to the full the benefits that have come to us all by the construction of railways, and yet they wisely determined to deny to these corporations the power they at first assumed to possess. The people claimed that these corporate persons were created for the public good, and while conceding to the capital employed its right to a fair return, they insisted that in the exercise of their powers they should be governed by law.

In most of the States laws were enacted for railway control, and the courts were appealed to by the contestants to decide whether the corporations or the people were right, and it is enough to say that the claim of the people to legislative control has been fully sustained. The right of legislative control has been exercised in the States not only for the benefit of the people but to the acknowledged benefit of railway property, both parties having learned by experience that they have a common interest that is best subserved by such regulations as a just law prescribes.

But, Mr. Speaker, in a Government like ours, which exercises control over all the States, covering as they do a wide extent of country, it is found that State control is not sufficient. Our vast internal commerce requires an interstate regulation, and that is attempted by the bill before us, which if passed will mark the first step, as I have said, in the national control of railways, and it is because this bill asserts the right of national control of railways that it has my support.

My second reason for the support of this measure is, that its provisions are framed in the spirit of justice and fairness to all parties. It would not be proper to legislate on this question merely to establish a right to do so by the General Government. There should be grievances to be redressed, and wrongs to be righted; there should be interests to be defended, and the general welfare promoted, or the national Legislature should not interfere.

Sir, I will not go over the well-trodden path to show that national legislation is demanded—the fact is conceded by the owners as well as the users of railways—that a just and proper regulation of interstate commerce would be a real benefit to all concerned. So far as I know, every member of this House favors the object of this bill—unless it be the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], who seems to fear that it is wholly in the interest of the railways, and utterly devoid of merit.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not share the fears of that gentleman, nor do I agree with those who expect that the long and short haul provision will increase the cost of transportation on cereals and other heavy freight. Those who have had experience in business know how difficult it is to raise prices. Demand and supply regulate prices. If the quantity of freight seeking shipment exceeds the facilities for moving it, then is there afforded an opportunity to advance rates; but so long as the capacity of the railway is not fully taxed, so long as freight stands ready to be hauled at a price that will fairly remunerate the producer for his labor, the management will seek to increase the traffic of their railway and reduce the price charged for the haul. Nothing will prevent this but such combination as pooling provides; and such combinations are forbidden by the bill. It is claimed, however, that either the long-haul rates must be raised, or the short-haul must be reduced; and inasmuch as the railways must earn enough to pay the fixed charges and dividends on their shares, nothing else can be done but to advance the long-haul rates, and thus bring ruin to the producers of the West and the consumers of the East, and vice versa.

Sir, I have no fears that such will be the case. It must be remembered that a very large proportion of railway freights are local to the States and not affected by this bill. It should also be borne in mind that the railways of the United States have been so managed as to transport freight at less cost than any other railroads in existence elsewhere, and I venture to assert that in this respect they will achieve still greater triumphs. Our railway managers and engineers are ever on the alert to lessen the cost of the work. The twenty-five ton freight car has taken the place of the ten-ton car; the fifty-six pound steel rail is being displaced by the eighty-pound, ninety-pound and even one-hundred-pound rail; the light locomotive is supplanted by the "great moguls;" the quality of the track is being bettered constantly, and all for the purpose of being equipped to meet competition and to make money at low rates.

Another fact should be remembered; the worth of capital loaned on good securities may be fairly stated at 3 or 4 per cent. per annum. The vast increase of capital in this country points to the conclusion that a lower rate of earnings for capital invested must be accepted. Railway shares now dividing 8 per cent. must be reduced one-half in many instances, and railway bonds must bear the same proportionate reduction. In fact, sir, it would be neither strange nor unjust if this squeezing process should go on until it shall wring out some of the water which some of these railway stocks contain.

There is good authority for saying that all of the railways in the United States could be reproduced to-day at one-half the sum for which they are bonded and capitalized—a shrinkage of four billions of dollars of capital on which to earn interest and dividends. By what right are we required to withhold legislation, such as the people justly demand, lest the process may squeeze out the water some of these stocks may contain? A capitalization that is not based upon a real investment is unjust and can not be allowed to call for such dividends as a real cash investment is entitled to without laying a burden on the producer that is hard to be borne.

Mr. Speaker, I have no fear of permanent injustice being done to any class, even should railway rates be reduced on the short haul, as it is claimed by some will be the result of this legislation.

My third reason for supporting this bill is, that it is a practical measure, and one capable of being enforced. Sir, I do not look upon railroad men with feelings of distrust. They are, as a rule, fair-minded and just men; they have shown as much probity in their business as any other class; they know well that in the long run the interests of the property committed to their hands will best be subserved by a law that will do justice to shipper and transporter alike.

Let this bill become a law; let the President appoint such a commission as the law contemplates, and in my opinion the work of adjusting existing wrongs will be entered upon in good faith—the patrons of the railway and its managers will have their claims fairly considered; the complaints of one party and the demands of the other will each have their proper weight, and out of this first grand step will grow such rules as will restore to the people the confidence they ought to possess in the great system of railways, which has done so much in the past and will do more in the future to promote the general good.

As time progresses new legislation may, and probably will be demanded, but this, sir, begins the needed legislation, and shall have my support.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CRISP. If no one else desires to address the House, I move an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BENNETT: Papers in the claim of Elsie A. Lumsden and of Alexander Oldham, of New Hanover County, North Carolina—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LANDES: Of 206 citizens of the sixteenth district of Illinois.

By Mr. LITTLE: Petition of Mrs. Henrietta L. Monroe, president, and other officers of the Ohio Women's Christian Temperance Union, for the passage of the Blair bill.

By Mr. PINDAR: Of citizens of the twenty-fourth district of New York.

By Mr. SAWYER: Of 94 citizens of the thirty-first district of New York.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 21, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ROBERT STRACHAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 574) for the relief of Robert Strachan; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BATTLE SWORD OF CAPT. S. C. REID.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a communication addressed to me by Mr. Samuel C. Reid, who offers to the United States the battle sword (now in my custody) of his father, Capt. Samuel Chester Reid, who commanded the United States private-armed brig General Armstrong, at the battle of Fayal, in September, 1814.

I respectfully recommend that appropriate action be taken by Congress for the acceptance of this gift.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 20, 1887.

STATE DEPARTMENT CONTINGENT FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to transmit to the Senate herewith a report of the Secretary of State in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, requesting "estimates for the contingent fund of each bureau" in the Department of State.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 20, 1887.

CLAIMS AGAINST REPUBLIC OF HAYTI.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State in answer to the resolution of the Senate of December 8, 1886, relative to the claims of Antonio Pelletier and A. H. Lazare against the Republic of Hayti.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 20, 1887.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. The Chair is in doubt whether it is necessary to order accompanying documents to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably they had better not be printed at first, and the Committee on Foreign Relations can examine them and see whether they need be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting copies of a memorial of several historical societies, and making statement relative to the purchase of a digest and catalogue of documents in Europe relating to the early history of the United States, prepared by B. F. Stevens.

Mr. HOAR. I move that all the papers be printed and referred to the Committee on the Library. They are very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the letter of the Secretary of State read?

Mr. HOAR. It is not necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be read.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; that is the ordinary courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter need not be read. It will be printed with the accompanying papers, in the usual way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the United States Treasury relative to an appropriation of $50,000 for printing and separating silver certificates and legal-tender notes, and preparing them for issue; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of January 19, 1887, the report of Capt. Moses Harris, First Cavalry, acting superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park; which, if there be no objection, will, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON. Should not the document be referred to the Committee on Territories, relating as it does to the Yellowstone National Park? I make that suggestion in the absence of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a communication from the superintendent of the park?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. ALLISON. That was called for by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] day before yesterday, and I think with a view of presenting it to the Committee on Appropriations, with some idea of changing the method of governing the park.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting a statement as to the rents paid for rooms and building for the use of the United States courts, with a view of increasing the appropriation therefor; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting an estimate of appropriation of $10,000 for improving the water-power of the Rock Island arsenal; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of New Lisbon, Ohio, and a petition of citizens of Ohio generally, praying for a repeal of the internal-revenue taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Miller bill for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of druggists of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for a reduction of the internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of the Detroit (Michigan) White Lead Works, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Lewis Johnson and 31 other citizens of Grayling, Mich., praying for a reduction of the special taxes and for the repeal of "the prohibitory and monopolistic features" of the oleomargarine bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented the memorial of D. Follmer and 31 other citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the extension of the patent to David L. Garner for a spring-tooth harrow; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PALMER. I present also a petition of 2,500 women of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of statutes providing for the adequate punishment of crimes against women and girls, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I will state that the names signed to the petition include a large number of the most respectable women in Michigan, women known in all good works, and I hope that the petition will not receive the treatment that many petitions do. I hope it will be acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of Hugh H. Osgood, of Norwich, Conn., praying for the repeal of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I present a petition of leading officials of Jefferson County, Kentucky, and 135 merchants, bankers, and citizens of Louisville, praying for the reduction of the special taxes on oleomargarine, and asking that the same may be equalized so that wholesale dealers in oleomargarine shall not pay $480 a year while wholesale tobacco dealers pay only $240 a year. The petition is sent to me with the following letter:

LOUISVILLE, KY., January 19, 1887.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the request of a large number of our merchants, I write and inclose a bill reducing the wholesale and retail dealers' special licenses on oleomargarine, and request that you introduce the same and ask for its reference to your Finance Committee.

These exorbitant special taxes have completely ruined the Southern trade of our commission merchants in this commodity, and consequently is a great loss to the business interest of our city. The law works in the interest of the large manufactories of Chicago.

I also send you a memorial to the same effect, signed by our officials and merchants. It is needless for me to add anything further, as you are so familiar with the whole subject.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE T. WOOD.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK,
Washington, D. C.

Accompanying the petition is a carefully prepared bill to carry out the purposes of the petition. I move the reference of all these papers to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I present three similar petitions, one signed by R. S. Frazer and 21 other citizens of Covington, Ky., another signed by a number of citizens of Paducah, Ky., and another by citizens of Newport, Ky., all to the same effect. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I present the petition of John M. Spear and a large number of other citizens of Eastport, Me., petitioning for retaliatory legislation against Canada in the fishery matter, and also for an increase of duty upon fresh and salt fish. It is accompanied by a letter to me urging upon me diligence in this matter. I do not think that Canada will make any complaint that I have not been diligent in the matter of the fisheries, so far as I am concerned; and I simply would like my constituents to understand that, so far as imposing a duty upon fish is concerned, it is not, under the Constitution, in the power of the United States Senate to originate a bill imposing such duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie upon the table.

Mr. BROWN. I present a memorial from the mayor and aldermen and a large number of merchants and business men of Brunswick, Ga., strongly protesting against the report of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, recommending the consolidation of the ports of Georgia into one collection district. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER presented the petition of Captain John Cowden in relation to the non-compliance of Captain James B. Eads with the provisions of the so-called Eads jetty act; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of George W. White and other citizens of Maine, praying for the rebuilding of the breakwater at the northerly entrance of Owl's Head Harbor, Me.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of T. H. Woodward and 24 other citizens of Elk Falls, Kans., praying for a reduction of the special taxes, and for the repeal of the obnoxious and prohibitory features of the oleomargarine bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have just received two memorials from the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, in reference to the Charleston jetties, which the Senate took action upon the other day. I move the reference of the memorials to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I have also received similar petitions from the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston. I move their reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS presented the petition of F. A. Linsley and 26 other citizens of the city of New York, praying for a reduction of the special taxes and repeal of "the obnoxious, prohibitory, and monopolistic features" of the oleomargarine act; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of William W. Wright, a petition of Francis Keirns, and a petition of William J. Carlisle, praying for the enactment of a law extending the time for filing claims for pension arrears; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of Woodward, Faxson & Co., wholesale druggists of Kansas City, Mo., praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the Burlington County Agricultural Society, of New Jersey, praying for the passage of the agricultural experiment-station bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Vessel-Owners and Captains' Association, favoring the passage of the bill abolishing compulsory pilotage; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of H. A. Crawford, J. M. Thompson, George A. Baker, and other citizens of Saint Louis, Mo., praying for the repeal of internal-revenue taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Marion, Kans., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 1096) for the amendment of the present pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Privileges and Elections occasioned by the death of Senator LOGAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy on the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SPOONER to fill the vacancy.

DISTRICT LIQUOR LICENSES.

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a petition to this body signed by the officers and the executive committee of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, representing hundreds of the Christian women of this District.

I assume no responsibility for the startling facts embraced in this petition, while I do answer for the pure motives and the high character of those who lay it before this body.

The petition is bold and aggressive. It challenges the investigation of the facts, and for this very reason it has a claim upon our attention. It is a plea by mothers and wives who honor this city by all benevolent acts and by the most exalted virtues. It is an appeal by dependent womanhood to this body of "grave and reverend seigniors" for protection against such an excess of vice and lawlessness in this capital of our Union as should not only alarm but humiliate us.

We can never disregard the voice of woman when it is uttered in behalf of social purity and of public virtue. This petition brings such an impeachment against this city and this District as to lead one to believe we are but little better, in a condition of immorality, than that state which denotes the lowest of existence.

It has caused these petitioners no little struggle to venture before this body. They know how hard is the lot of the reformer; they know how they expose themselves to the flings of the heartless and the supercilious. The well-meaning and the benevolent they well know are often put on the defensive when their only effort is to snatch others from destruction.

We have ample power in this District; our responsibility is well known, and how we use it or how we refuse to use it will attest our fidelity to the trust committed to us. If the facts, the dreadful facts, which are brought to light by this petition shall be proved to be well founded, I can not see why we should not intervene to redress these grievances. I can not see how we can excuse ourselves to our own consciences, to the people of this country, or to the world, if we evade our duty.

I ask that the petition be read in the hearing of this body, and let it go, as a matter of course, upon the record. The petition is supplemented by a resolution of a preachers' meeting in this city, representing twenty pastors of churches here, and I ask that that may also be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the petition referred to by him be read. If there be no objection it will be read at length.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator to allow me to let the petition which I hold in my hand, coming from a number of citizens of Virginia, accompany his, as it touches the same subject-matter in the District of Columbia. The petition I present need not be read, but the Senator's name is mentioned in it, and the bill is mentioned in it. Just let this accompany his petition, and read only the one he has sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the petition if there be no objection. The petition presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January, 1887.

To the Senate of the United States:

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, of the District of Columbia, respectfully represent to your honorable body that their said organization, composing a large membership of Christian women, feel constrained, in the interest of their homes and the best interests of all the people of this District, to respectfully and sorrowfully submit the following facts:

That the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, disregarding the purity, the safety, and the moral interests and rights of the people, and in direct violation of law, as we believe, are, and have been for months past, permitting and protecting gambling halls, pool rooms, and drinking establishments, as well as dens of prostitution, immorality, and vice, in carrying on their vicious and pernicious business in all sections of the city. Your petitioners respectfully represent that in their free and unlimited distribution of grog-shop, saloon, and liquor licenses they have increased the number of said places to an unprecedented extent, being more than one hundred in excess of any other period in the history of the District, and have foisted upon the people a liquor establishment to about every one hundred and forty persons, and if there be added to this alarming list the great number of known bawdy houses, pool rooms, gambling houses, and other dens of vice, there is an array of facts appalling to contemplate; and when to this is added the further charge, resting upon facts within the knowledge of your petitioners, that many of these dens of wretchedness and vice have liquor licenses, and all of them are known, protected, and permitted, not by quiet acquiescence of the District commissioners, which your petitioners suggest would be terrible enough, but by the aggressive authority and protection of said commissioners, a case is presented shocking in the extreme; and when it is further added that all the licenses are granted by the commissioners, and many of them in direct violation of law, as we believe, and against reports and protests of the police, and of the residents, a case is presented, as it seems to your petitioners, demanding, in the interests of humanity and common decency, a most thorough and careful investigation.

And when it is further considered that large numbers of the houses of prostitution, and known to the commissioners to be such, have during the past year been permitted to deposit $100 with the District commissioners, or with the proper officer by their direction, and then permitted to sell all kinds of liquor without ever obtaining licenses, because it was claimed to be essential to the successful prosecution of their most nefarious and degrading business, this adds but another link to the chain of evils of which this community may justly complain. Recently a member of the police force was directed to gather up the outstanding receipts for the above mentioned deposits, and the commissioners, in direct violation of law, as your petitioners believe, have granted liquor licenses to many of said houses of prostitution and vice.

But your petitioners, to be more explicit in their charges of direct violation of law, respectfully submit:

First. That five restaurants or liquor saloons have been licensed on B street, between First and Second streets, southeast, without a majority of either the bona fide residents or owners of property, as required by law, and in direct violation of the act of August 23, 1871, section 10, and notwithstanding the adverse report of both the lieutenant and major of police. Said licenses were granted to James Foy, No. 105; George Paine, No. 135; Sarah J. Schaefer, No. 139; E. V. Rice, No. 145, and Eugene M. Chilina, No. 147 B street southeast, all on the same block, and the same offense and violation of law has been committed in other cases, concerning which your petitioners will furnish evidence whenever your honorable body may desire it.

Second. By the same act, sections 3 and 15, it is provided that these drinking-houses shall not be open on Sundays, or after 12 o'clock midnight, or before 4 o'clock a. m. This law is violated in numerous cases every Sunday, and the persons so violating it and their places of business are known, yet the licenses of these known offenders have not been revoked.

Third. The act of October 10, 1886, section 6, provides that, before issuing a license, the commissioners shall be fully satisfied of the good moral character of the person applying, yet they have issued liquor licenses to bawdy houses, known to the commissioners to be such, and so reported to them by the police, among which will be found the following notorious houses of prostitution located as follows: Numbers 313 Thirteen-and-a-half street northwest, 309 Thirteen-and-a-half street northwest, corner Fifteenth and D streets northwest, 1313 D street northwest, and your petitioners respectfully submit that they will supply the names of these and many others whenever your honorable body or a committee desire.

Fourth. The same laws provide that but one bar shall be allowed under one and the same license. Yet this has been repeatedly violated with the full knowledge of the commissioners, who, being fully advised of the fact by the police, have failed to revoke the licenses in such cases, or to do any other thing to prevent or punish such violations of this provision of the law, conspicuous cases of which are the race-course, Scheutzen Park, and George Holmes's saloon, where two or more bars in each place are conducted under one license.

Fifth. By the police and commissioners' regulations it is provided that no licenses shall be issued for the sale of liquors within 400 feet of any public school. But this provision has been violated in the case of the High School, on O street, the Wallach, Peabody, and other schools, a specific reference to each of which will be furnished whenever desired.

Sixth. Your petitioners further charge that the commissioners have violated the license law in granting licenses to men charged with crime, and dating said licenses back so as to defeat and prevent conviction under the law; a conspicuous case of which was that of Jerry Keef, corner of Third and Q streets northwest, who was arrested for selling liquor without a license, whereupon the commissioners gave him a license dated back to cover the period of his offense, and that, too, without requiring the consent of a majority of the residents and property owners, as required by law. Many other cases exist that will be furnished whenever desired.

Seventh. Your petitioners further charge that house and premises No. 1422 Pennsylvania avenue is owned by one of the District commissioners, and is rented to one W. W. Gould and used by and for the gambling schemes of the Louisiana State Lottery, M. A. Dauphin, agent; that the use of the said building for said gambling purposes is well know to said commissioner and is permitted by him.

Eighth. Your petitioners further submit that the District commissioners, before entering upon the discharge of their duties as such, are required to give bond in the sum of $50,000, and your petitioners charge that Frank Hume, the president of the Liquor Dealers' Association of the District, is the bondsman of one of said commissioners, and there is reason to believe largely controls the granting of liquor licenses.

Wherefore, your petitioners most respectfully pray that the United States Senate direct a thorough investigation of the facts charged herein, regarding the administration of the District government, and provide for the proper enforcement of law and the protection of the homes of the District.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

MRS. SARAH D. LA FETRA,
President.
MISS LIZZIE C. KESSLER,
Corresponding Secretary.

METHODIST PREACHERS' MEETING, FOUNDRY CHURCH,
January 17, 1887.

Inasmuch as we have heard from a committee of the Women's Christian Temperance Union an explanation of the statement of charges against the administration of the District government, and their petition to the Senate of the United States for an investigation of these charges:

Resolved, That we agree with the ladies of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in this petition for a thorough investigation.

WM. H. CHAPMAN, President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition and accompanying paper will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The petition presented by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], of citizens of Virginia, in favor of conferring upon citizens of the District the right to determine by ballot the question of granting liquor licenses, will also be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY. The statement in the petition which has been presented by the Senator from Georgia is a tremendous indictment. It is a shocking revelation. I submit to him whether there ought not to be instructions to the District Committee or to some special committee to make an immediate and severe investigation.

Mr. COLQUITT. I did not feel that it was incumbent upon me to make any suggestions to the committee. I had no doubt that they would be in full sympathy with any movement with a view to suppress these heinous offenses, and that they themselves would suggest measures for their suppression. It is with confidence, therefore, that I commit the petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the allegations that are presented in the petition which has been read touching the condition of affairs in this District concerning the sale of distilled and fermented liquors, concern a question that has long engaged the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There is no doubt that there is a very great violation not only of law but of moral and social order in connection with the transactions to which the petition refers. In my judgment licenses have been granted in violation of the statutory provision of Congress upon the subject.

But in order that the Senate and the country may understand that the District Committee has neither been oblivious nor neglectful of these matters, I feel it to be my duty now to call the attention of this body to the fact that on the 4th day of February, 1886, I introduced a bill regulating the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the committee of which I am chairman. On the 19th of that month the bill was reported by me with an amendment, and subsequently, during the last session of Congress, was passed by the Senate; and if the other branch of Congress had been as diligent as the Senate has been, one great cause of complaint which has been set forth in the petition that has been read would have been removed.

In order that the Senate and the country may understand exactly what has been done by this body for the purpose of correcting those evils whose existence we all admit and all deplore, I ask that the Chief Clerk may read again the bill that passed this body, and which is now pending before the District Committee of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill referred to will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1380) regulating the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act, all persons who shall obtain from the assessor of the District of Columbia licenses as dealers in distilled and fermented liquors, wines, and cordials in said District, under existing laws, shall pay annually for such license the sum of $300: Provided, That such license shall not authorize any person to sell such liquors, wines, or cordials in less quantity than one pint, nor to be drunk upon the premises where sold.

SEC. 2. That proprietors of bar-rooms who shall obtain licenses in the said District shall pay $500 annually for such license. Every place where distilled, malt, or fermented liquors, wines, or cordials are sold to be drunk on the premises, or in quantities less than one pint, shall be regarded as a bar-room; and the possession of malt, distilled, fermented, or any intoxicating liquors, with the means and appliances for carrying on the business of disposing of the same to be drunk where sold, shall constitute the premises a bar-room within the meaning of this act. And it shall be the duty of the proprietor of every such place to deposit with the collector the amount of his license-fee with his application for license, and also present to the commissioners the written permission of a majority of the persons owning real estate and a majority of the residents keeping house on the side of the square where it is desired to locate such business, and on the side of the square fronting opposite to the same; and such license shall not be issued until approved by the commissioners. And no liquors shall be sold except in compliance with the provisions of this act, nor to minors, nor intoxicated persons, nor habitual drunkards, nor on Sunday; and every bar or other place where liquors are usually sold shall be kept closed on Sunday during the day and night, and all such places shall be kept closed each and every day between 12 o'clock midnight and 4 o'clock in the morning.

SEC. 3. That any person engaged in the business specified in this act without first having obtained a license under its provisions shall be liable to a fine of not more than $500, in addition to the amount of license required.

SEC. 4. That any person having obtained a license under the provisions of this act who shall violate any of such provisions shall be liable for any such violation to a fine not exceeding $200, and in addition thereto his license may be revoked by the commissioners in their discretion; and all fines and penalties incurred under this act shall be collected upon information duly filed in the police court in the manner prescribed for similar offenses, and shall be applied to the use of the District.

Mr. PLATT. That bill is in the nature of what is known as a high license law. It has many provisions——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds the Senator from Connecticut that there is nothing before the Senate. The discussion goes on by general consent.

Mr. PLATT. Yet the Senator from Kansas was permitted to address the Senate, and I desire to make a single observation.

Mr. INGALLS. I am sure there can be no objection, in view of what has been said, that the Senator from Connecticut should be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to make a single observation in reference to the passage of the bill in the Senate.

It is, as I have said, a high license law. It contains many valuable provisions and restrictions, and in that respect it is infinitely better than the present law and the practices which have prevailed in the District of Columbia with regard to the licensing of the sale of intoxicating liquors.

I had intended when that bill was pending in the Senate to have asked a vote of the Senate upon an amendment which I have prepared and which I desire to submit in the nature of a prohibitory law for the District of Columbia; but, at the time when the bill was considered and passed, I was unavoidably absent on account of my health. I desire to say now that it was my intention to determine the sense of the Senate upon the question whether in legislating for the District of Columbia we would adopt the high license system or the system of prohibition.

I believe in prohibition. I know with what difficulty prohibitory laws are enforced, but this is the capital of the nation. The power of legislation for the District of Columbia in all matters is committed to Congress, and if anywhere in the United States prohibition can be enforced it is here, where the whole power of Government can be invoked in aid of the enforcement of such a law.

I think it is here that the honest, vigorous, thorough attempt to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors should be made. If, with all the power of the Government back of such a law, it should fail, that would seem to be a determination of the question whether prohibitory legislation can be enforced. If it should succeed, it would seem to demonstrate the fact that, with proper authority and with proper effort, the observance of prohibitory laws can be enforced, and the sale of intoxicating liquors, which does more than any other one thing to harm and hinder and retard the prosperity and growth of this country, can be suppressed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 3184) granting the Utah Midland Railway Company the right of way through the Uncompahgre and Uintah reservations, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3094) granting the Utah Midland Railway Company the right of way through the Uncompahgre and Uintah reservations, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2812) to approve an act of the thirteenth Legislative Assembly of Arizona, entitled "An act to establish, maintain, and provide for the government of an insane asylum," approved March 9, 1885, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8893) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to execute a deed of quitclaim and release to a certain alley in Washington to Cornelia P. Randolph and others, reported it without amendment.

WILLIAM ERVIN.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, to report it back, with a recommendation that the Senate do not concur in the amendment made to the bill by the House of Representatives. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I now move that the Senate insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3185) to abolish the useless and extravagant Misssissippi River Commission; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3186) to restore navigation to the harbor of Vicksburg, Miss., at private expense unless successful; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3187) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 3188) to authorize the Georgia Pacific Railway Company of Alabama and Mississippi to construct bridges across the Sunflower, Yazoo, and Tombigbee Rivers, in the State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 3189) granting a pension to Mary E. Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3190) granting a pension to Robert H. Sturgess; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 3191) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FISHERIES REPORT.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, touching our fisheries, numbered 1683; one-third thereof for the use of the Senate and two-thirds for the use of the House.

WARM SPRINGS INDIAN RESERVATION, OREGON.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to advise the Senate at his earliest practicable convenience whether four townships, or any other quantity, of the public lands in Wasco County, State of Oregon, has within the past year been withdrawn from settlement and attached to the Warm Springs Indian reservation; and if so, upon what authority and for what purpose has this been done.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MEXICO.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested, if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest, to communicate, at his earliest convenience, copies of all correspondence between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of Mexico in reference to the seizure and sale by the Mexican authorities of the American schooner Rebecca, in the port of Tampico, or other port in Mexico; and that he also communicate to the Senate all correspondence between the Secretary of State and Hon. Henry R. Jackson, late minister to Mexico, in reference to the resignation of Minister Jackson, together with all correspondence addressed by Minister Jackson to the President on the subject of his resignation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1813) to amend the law relating to patents, trade-marks, and copyright.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

MISSOURI RIVER COMMISSION REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 200 extra copies of the Appendix A B to the report of the Missouri River Commission, House Executive Document No. 28, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, for the use of the commission, to report it with a substitute, for which I ask present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on the 13th instant:

Resolved, That 200 extra copies of the Appendix A B to the report of the Missouri River Commission, House Executive Document No. 28, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, be printed for the use of the commission.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert:

That 200 additional copies of the report of the Missouri River Commission, with the appendices A and B, House Executive Document No. 28, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, be printed for the use of the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT OF ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report from the Committee on Printing the joint resolution (S. R. 94) ordering the printing of the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences, with the accompanying memoirs. This is the usual annual joint resolution, and I ask that it be considered immediately.

An appropriation act last year made a new requirement that the cost should be reported also, and also the previous appropriations under the same head. The formal report is with the papers. These volumes of the report of the National Academy of Sciences will cost about $8,000. The previous appropriations amount to $133,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give notice on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations that to-morrow, immediately after the completion of the strict morning business, or as soon thereafter as I can get the floor, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill respecting the protection of American fishermen that was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations a day or two since.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator mean to-morrow or Monday?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean to-morrow.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the joint resolution (S. R. 98) relative to the forfeiture of certain lands granted to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of a line of road from Fernandina to Tampa Bay, Florida, which was introduced by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The resolution which I desire the Senate to take action upon is a resolution instructing the Attorney-General of the United States to bring such proceedings as may be proper, by injunction or otherwise, to prevent the sale of lands under the grant of May 17, 1856, to the State of Florida.

In my former address to the Senate, of which this is the continuation, I established very clearly from the journals of the Legislature of Florida of 1858 that the State of Florida refused to give any rights or interest in this grant to the railroad company which is now claiming the right to sell and dispose of it; that is, the Florida Navigation and Railway Company and its assignors. The journal shows that the vote sustaining the report of the attorney-general declaring that the Florida Railroad Company had no right to the land was a unanimous one in the house, with the exception of one vote to the contrary.

Here is the law which was passed at that time incorporating another company with which this has no privity and no connection, and giving to that other company the benefits of the internal-improvement act of Florida of 1855 and 1856. So there is no question that here is a grant stated by the General Land Office to amount to more than 1,000,000 acres of land, reserved from entry and settlement in favor of this company, and of which sales have been made and are being made dispossessing citizens of the United States who have by law a right to enter and homestead these lands, and who in a great many cases have settled upon and improved them. They are in many instances poor and their families are entirely dependent on their labor and on the little tracts of land which they have improved. The question is, what will the Senate do to protect their clear and unquestionable right and title as against a corporation without right of title?

Here is a reservation of 1,000,000 acres and more, according to the statement of the amount of this grant by the General Land Office, the residue of which amounts to over a million acres by estimation, disposed of against the laws of the State declaring that this company was not the beneficiary, and without any legislation whatever on the part of the State in their favor giving to this railroad company any right or interest in these lands.

That is a remarkable fact, that without any legislation whatever on the part of the State by its Legislature, any person, either a corporate body or a private citizen, should have appeared in the General Land Office and stated that he or it has located a line of road and obtained a reservation of the lands of the United States, which by law have been dedicated to the settlement and occupation and ownership of the people who may cultivate them. That is the case I am presenting to the Senate. I think it is one which is sufficient to attract the attention of Senators. I think their sworn duty requires them to give some consideration to such a large disposition of the public lands without any authority whatever. I have made out a case in which there is no doubt. I have exhibited to you the journal of the Legislature of Florida, denying to this railroad company—the Florida Railroad Company, which is the Atlantic, West India and Gulf Transit Company by change of name, and is now the Florida Railway and Navigation Company, that company having consolidated the lines of several companies of which the Florida Railroad Company was one—any right to this grant. I have read to you, and have it here, the journal published by authority of the Legislature of Florida, of 1858, containing the message of the governor, stating the fact that the time had expired when that company could have the benefit of this grant; stating the fact that another company had been organized, recommending to the Legislature to allow to this other company the benefit of this grant, the bill introduced into the Legislature and its reference to the attorney-general for his opinion whether the Florida Railroad Company have any right to the benefits of the internal-improvement act on this part of the line, the final passage of the bill by a unanimous vote, and I have it here in my hand in the public acts of the State. That is very conclusive proof on that subject. This is the act:

An act to incorporate a company to construct a railroad from a point on the Florida Railroad, in East Florida, to Tampa Bay, under the style of the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company.

Here are all the acts and all the laws continuous in time for your examination, so that there can be no pretense of a claim that the State has ever conferred any right under this grant to this railroad company, or its predecessor, or any other existing corporation. If this is denied, here are the laws to disprove such denial.

The Florida Railroad Company was a different company. This is the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company. The Florida Railroad Company was incorporated in 1854, 1855, and 1856 by original act and amendments. In 1858 this new company and this controversy arose in the house in the Legislature of 1858, whether or not they had a right to this grant as a part of the benefits of the internal-improvement act. In this act, in its fifth section, it is said:

That the trustees of the internal-improvement fund shall, immediately upon receiving notice from the company—

That is, the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company—

of their acceptance of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for and encourage a liberal system of internal-improvement"— have the benefit of this grant. That was the only law which gave any right to this company. The company expired. The act limits it as to the time in which it should perform the obligation of building a railroad, and it expired without their doing it. The company that had the benefit of that act, therefore, never had any real and permanent existence and never located their road, never completed their road, and are to-day a defunct and unknown corporation.

Mr. President, in 1856 this grant was made upon condition that a railroad should be built in ten years. In 1866 it expired, and the road was not built. It was not even located under the internal-improvement act; it was not commenced. In 1868 the Legislature of the State of Florida passed a resolution by which it will be seen that they did not even claim the grant of 1856. I call attention to this resolution to show in what manner our public domain has been attempted to be disposed of in this case by the General Land Office. This is a resolution of the Legislature of 1868–'69.

Whereas by reason of the conflict of arms which prevailed in this State between the years of 1861 and 1865 it became impracticable to proceed with the construction of the roads comprehended in the system of internal improvement adopted by this State, whereby the grant of lands made by the United States in aid thereof, so far as applicable to the unconstructed portion of said system, expired by the operation of the limitation contained in the fourth section of the act of Congress making said grant; and

Whereas this State is now desirous of promoting the completion of the said system, or so much of the unfinished part as leads from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to urge the early passage of an act reviving the grant contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," approved May 17, 1856, and that the operation of said act be extended to a term of —— years from the passage of an act reviving the aforesaid grant; but nothing herein contained shall be construed as a request to grant any lands to companies heretofore chartered by any State of the Union or by any act of Congress.

That was the declaration of the Legislature of 1868 acknowledging that this grant had expired by the terms of the act and the failure to perform any of the conditions contained in it as to this line of road from Waldo to Tampa, and asking Congress to revive it upon the condition that this company and other companies standing in the like position, chartered before 1860, should not have the benefit of it. What do you think of that?

Mr. President, here is, first, an entire absence of all authority; and, in the second place, an express declaration by the Legislature of the State in 1868, nearly twelve years before this reservation was made in the General Land Office, that this company now claiming it should not have the benefit of it, and asking its revival on that condition. We are that far from having any legislative authority from the State to this company for any interest in this grant.

But let us look a little, and see how it is that such an extraordinary transaction could have occurred. The internal-improvement act of Florida, it is claimed, in its twenty-first section, authorized the Florida Railroad Company to receive the benefit of this grant. That is the ground upon which the application is made, and which is assumed in the opinion of the different Secretaries, not having investigated the proposition, or claiming to have done so, but assuming that it was so. In the application of the railroad company they say:

By the twenty-first section of the Florida internal-improvement act it was provided "that, should the United States Government grant lands to the State of Florida for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the lines of railroad indicated (the line from Amelia Island to Tampa being one), said lines of railroad shall be entitled to all the benefits and advantages arising from said grant that the State of Florida would be entitled to by the construction of said lines of railway," and proceeded to require and authorize the governor, should such an act be passed by the United States Government, "to direct said railroad companies to select said land, and to take such other action as may be necessary to fully secure the grant of lands to said railroad companies," subject to all the conditions and restrictions of the act of Congress.

It will be borne in mind by such Senators as feel any interest in protecting the public property of the United States and the citizens of the United States, and who think it a part of their duty and their function here to give attention when a great question concerning thousands of the people of the country and the Treasury of the United States and its public domain is under consideration—such Senators as conceive that to be a part of their public duty, and who will give some consideration to this very important question to the people of Florida and to the public domain—that they claim under the twenty-first section of the internal-improvement act, which I have read, that the present Florida Railway and Navigation Company, which is the successor, having consolidated the line with that of the Atlantic, Gulf and West India Transit Company and of the Florida Railroad, has a right to this grant under that provision of the act.

I propose to show that the Florida Railroad Company, as I have already shown by the action of the Legislature of 1858, was not one of those companies. That act provides what companies under that act are entitled to the benefits of it; but it also says that they shall accept the benefits of the act within six months; and when the question came up in the Legislature of 1858, upon the message of the governor, M. S. Perry, which stated that they had not accepted the benefits of the act, that they had not complied with its provisions two years after it had passed, and that the time had expired, the Legislature, unanimously almost, acting upon the opinion of the attorney-general, incorporated another company, and gave them exclusively the benefits of the act; but nothing is said about that in this application of the Florida Railroad Company and its successors to Secretary Schurz and his successors. Nothing could be said about it, for it certainly disproved their statement that a map of location under authority of law had been filed in the office of the Secretary of Interior in 1860, because such a map or location of their line under the internal-improvement act was forbidden by the act of the Legislature of 1858, granting the exclusive benefits of the internal-improvement act to the Florida Peninsular Railroad Company.

They were required by the internal-improvement act to accept in writing filed in the office of the secretary of state within six months. They were required to grade 20 miles of their road within two years, and the governor of the State, as I have read from his message, formally announced to the Legislature that they had done neither; that under their original charter they had a right to build the road, but not to have the benefit of the internal-improvement act; that they were not one of the companies recognized under that act for the line from Waldo to Tampa, and the Legislature so decided, and chartered another company to build that line of road, and gave that other company the benefits of this grant and of all the other grants of the internal-improvement fund.

It is perhaps well for us to know a little about what this internal-improvement act and internal-improvement fund of Florida was, and what was meant by it. The act expired long ago. Twelve years before this reservation was made the act had become obsolete in all its essential parts; all its benefits had been disposed of, and the land which it contained, for it was a land fund, had been decreed to be sold by the United States court to pay the debts of this very Florida Railroad Company that is seeking now to obtain this grant—debts which have never been repaid to the State.

Even the school fund, and all the funds of the State connected with that road, were lost in that transaction, and yet they have reappeared in the Interior Department after a lapse of over twenty years to claim that they were for this part of the line entitled to this grant from which they were expressly excluded—to claim seven hundred thousand acres of the land of the United States on which hundreds of people have made their homes.

The internal-improvement act of Florida conveys all the swamp and overflowed lands of the State, which are estimated to amount to something like 20,000,000 acres. Out of 33,000,000 acres of area of the State of Florida, 20,000,000 are estimated to be swamp and overflowed, according to the practical selection and application of the swamp land act, although in fact much the greater part is high and dry. The State conveyed the whole of these lands and also all other grants of land made by the Federal Government for internal improvements to the State of Florida to certain trustees, the officers of the State government being ex officio the trustees of the fund. The trustees were to sell the lands and apply the proceeds of the sale to the payment of interest on the bonds guaranteed on certain lines of railroad.

I will proceed with my remarks though there are few Senators here. I think when we are here to perform public duties Senators ought to perform them, and give their attention to the public business. We are now examining a question of the disposition of a million acres of the area of the public domain of the United States in the State of Florida, and I am showing conclusively that it is the property of the United States, that it has never been disposed of, but that a reservation has been made at the General Land Office, and that large quantities of it have been allowed to be sold by private individuals upon an assumed state of facts which the public records disclose to be utterly untrue.

I have been proving that this claim is nothing more or less than a bold attempt to deprive thousands of citizens of their homes and their property given to them by the laws of the United States upon a false statement, which the public records of the State conclusively deny and disprove. I therefore have a right to demand of Senators that they shall give their attention to this subject and perform the duties of their office.

The internal-improvement act of Florida, under the twenty-first section, of which this company claims to have a right in this grant as the beneficiary of the State, was an act by which all the public lands in the State of Florida, given by the United States to the State for internal improvementsor as swamp and overflowed lands, were conveyed to certain trustees who were required to guarantee, by indorsement, interest on the bonds of certain railroad companies constructing certain specific lines of railroad in the State. The trust required them to sell these lands and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of interest upon this guarantee. The State acquired stock in the railroad companies thus designated whenever they paid this interest. The State became a director in the board of directors in each of these companies, and other securities were given for its protection for this investment by the trustees of the proceeds of the sale of these lands.

This grant of 1856 was made subsequent to the passage of this internal-improvement act, which was in 1855-'56, whereas the grant of Congress was made on the 17th of May, 1856. The act of the Legislature was passed in January, 1856, or December, 1855, but it contained this provision, that if the United States Government should make a grant of land in aid of the construction of these lines of road the companies authorized under the internal-improvement act should have the benefit thereof. The Florida Railroad Company accepted the benefits of this act from Amelia Island to Cedar Keys. We are considering the grant of the land for the railroad from Waldo to Tampa. From Amelia Island to Cedar Keys is a part of the line from Amelia Island to Tampa. The companies were authorized to construct parts of these lines. So, as I have said, when the controversy originated whether or not it was competent for the Legislature to incorporate another company and give to it the benefits of the grant from Waldo to Tampa Bay, it was decided by the State and by the Legislature that it was competent, that the Florida Railroad Company had no right in the line from Waldo to Tampa, and a new company, as I have said, was created.

The act further provided that the companies who had the benefits of that act, who accepted its provisions, should grade 20 miles of road within two years after having filed their written acceptance within six months of the passage of the act. I will put these sections of the law in my remarks.

They were required first to accept the benefits of that act within six months from December, 1855, or January, 1856; they were required to grade 20 miles within two years; they were required to complete their line within eight years from the passage of the act or forfeit all the benefits of the act. It has never been claimed that any of these things were done. Hence there was never any location under that grant made in 1856; and in 1868 the Legislature of the State, by a joint resolution, acknowledged and recognized the fact that the State had no claim upon the land, and requested Congress to revive the grant and extend it upon the condition that this road and its predecessor and all the other roads in the like case should not have the benefit of it.

There was never any legislation of the State at all upon the subject of this grant from that day until the time of Mr. Schurz's order overriding and reversing the wise and intelligent order of Mr. Chandler refusing to recognize this grant and its location. There was never any legislation of the State on the subject until they chartered in 1881 the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad, to be built from Chattahoochie to Pensacola, which is a part of the line; that is, the geographical line mentioned in the internal-improvement act. In that act, after giving that road, not the benefits of the internal-improvement act, but 23,600 acres to the mile of the swamp and overflowed lands, they say, we also give whatever right or interest the State may have in the grant of May 17, 1856—that is, the Pensacola and Atlantic Company in West Florida, not this Florida Navigation and Railway Company from Waldo to Tampa, but in West Florida, so far as the land lies in West Florida, a different section of the country—we give them whatever rights or interest we may have. The State had never made any claim of interest under that grant, or of location or anything else in all the years from 1866 to 1881.

The Pensacola and Georgia Railroad Company was a company fully entitled to the benefits of this act and recognized under it. That was the road from Jacksonville to Pensacola, in another and different direction. This is the road from Amelia Island to Tampa Bay, running south. The State of Florida, as we all know, runs along the Atlantic coast and the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and commencing at the Saint John's River one line of road went west, and the other line of road south and southwest.

So, then, in the first place this State never claimed, even if this be a claim, this grant till twelve years after its expiration, and then only gave such rights as they might have to land in West Florida, not South. The State never took any action on this subject except the passage of the internal-improvement act, passed before the grant was made by Congress, in which they provided in case it should be made that it should be a part of it, and the Pensacola and Atlantic road from Jacksonville to Pensacola, having been organized under the internal-improvement act, accepted its benefits, and, with other companies, graded its line and constructed some 170 miles of it from Quincy to Jacksonville, on the Saint John's River, and when the war occurred suspended its proceedings. When the war terminated the Florida Railroad Company, in the action of its president and its officials, claimed to be a completed road, because the act provided that when a road was completed it might be seized and sold, some other conditions being required, but that being one of them. So, in order to have this line from Amelia Island to Cedar Key seized and sold by the trustees, the company claimed that it was completed and that they had no further line to construct.

The Pensacola and Georgia road was also seized and sold, and has never been extended a yard beyond Chattahoochee, and has no privity or connection with the Pensacola and Atlantic Railroad Company.

Therefore, Mr. President, by the action of this very company that is now selling this land, by the action of its predecessor, the Florida Railroad Company, with whom it is in privity, and through whom it must claim, if it claims anything, these roads were sold, the internal-improvement fund and all its lands were seized by the circuit court for the bonds of the companies, and the land which had been conveyed to these trustees was directed to be sold and the proceeds applied on the interest of the bonds divested of the trust. So the trust itself has expired. There is no trust now. The State has given away the trust lands which constituted this fund, and were subject to this trust in the internal-improvement act specifically, to a half dozen different railroad companies, the acts incorporating which I will put in my remarks, and has given the benefits of this land to these other corporations to build other roads in the same direction and to the same terminal points in quantities of 10,000 and 15,000 and 23,600 acres, and the companies will receive the lands specifically divested of the trust.

So now, Mr. President, practically there is no act, and never was, granting the benefits of this grant to this railroad company or its predecessor; but, on the contrary, there is an act relinquishing the grant and asking Congress to renew it, and there are acts of incorporation of other companies on the same geographical line, acts of the Legislature disposing absolutely of the land which constituted the internal-improvement fund and which was contained in this internal-improvement act which directed that it be sold for the benefit of the different bonds of these different companies authorized under the acts of 1868 and 1869 under charters pre-existing. So, then, there is not a shadow of a pretense of a right of this company to any interest whatever under the grant of May, 1856.

Then what is there? We have here a certificate of the governor of the State, and that, I suppose, is what misled the Secretary of the Interior. We have first the application of the officials of this road in 1881, under the twenty-first section of that act under which, in 1858, as I have shown, the governor, the attorney-general, and the Legislature all decided that this company had no right, and incorporated another company to build the road; yet, in 1881, nearly a third of a century afterwards, they appear in the General Land Office and actually claim under that twenty-first section. Everybody was dead, or had forgotten almost what occurred; and the old records being difficult to obtain, they actually claimed, under the twenty-first section of that act, what the whole action of the State authorities had denied, what they never claimed after that time, and when the State had chartered another company to build the road. In 1882 a letter of the governor of Florida was presented to the Secretary of the Interior by the president of the Florida Railroad Company, through a gentleman who is now dead, and therefore I make no mention of him, in these words:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Tallahassee, Fla., July 11, 1881.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to certify that the railroad from Waldo to Ocala, in the State of Florida, being a part of the line of railroad from Amelia Island, on the Atlantic, to the waters of Tampa Bay, specified in the act of Congress approved May 17, 1856, and entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," has been completed, and is in actual operation, and that said railroad from Waldo to Ocala is of a continuous length of 44.88 miles.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

[SEAL.] W. D. BLOXHAM, Governor of Florida.

Attest:
JNO. L. CRAWFORD, Secretary of State.

That letter in relation to a geographical line is correct. It is on that geographical line. It is a part of the line mentioned in the act of Congress. All that is so; but the governor does not say, although it would appear to be inferred, that the road is constructed under the internal-improvement act of the State of 1858. He does not say that this grant was ever given to it by that twenty-first section, though it might be inferred that such was the case. It is true the certificate is somewhat ambiguous. It referred to the geographical line. It was also a part of the line contemplated by the act of Congress of 1856. It was a part also of the line of the old Florida Peninsular Railroad as a geographical fact, and it is a part of the line of the Tropical Railroad, and it is part of half a dozen others, but in the sense of its being a railroad corporation which the State made the beneficiary of the grant of 1856 there is not the least truth in the assertion; not that I mean to say that the governor of the State intended any misrepresentation, but I state the fact as shown by the twenty-first section of the act of the Legislature of Florida establishing a system of internal improvements under it and all this correspondence and all these opinions of the Secretary of the Interior. The right of this company to be the beneficiary of this act was declared to have ceased and determined by the governor, and by the Legislature, and by the attorney-general in 1858, two years after the time expired in which they could avail themselves of the benefit of it to give them any right whatever. Their claim was denied and never was asserted, and no location was ever made. There was a survey made under the original charter, they being authorized to go there, but there never was a survey and never a location under the internal-improvement act, and could not be for the reason that the State authorities declared by the almost unanimous vote of the house and a sufficient majority in the senate that they had no right, and gave the right to another company. And yet this certificate was made the basis of this reservation!

I do not know that it is necessary for me to detain the Senate any longer. I will say, however, that I am not unfriendly to corporations or to aiding railroad companies. I think there is a better way to do it than by giving them lands; but if that be decided to be the way, I am not in the way of it under proper limitations, but I am opposed to giving the homes of the people who have entered upon the public lands to corporations which have no claim whatever to them.

I desire this matter settled and the title vested somewhere, in somebody, in order that these people may obtain some recognition of their rights to their homes. The proper way to do it is to give them the land as the homestead laws give it to them, or allow them to purchase it. I have no doubt it will be better for the railroad companies that the country should be settled than that the company should hold this large amount of land.

But, Mr. President, this railroad company, the successor of the Florida Railroad Company, has over 300 miles of road built with the benefits of the internal-improvement act out of the gift of the swamp and overflowed lands without this Waldo and Tampa road. We find from the laws of Florida that there was exchanged in 1857 a large amount of the school fund, the bonds of the State of Florida in which the school fund was interested, for the bonds of this railroad company. We find that there were hundreds of thousands of acres of the public land given to it of the State lands. We find that there were several hundred thousand dollars of the money proceeds of the sale of land given to the road to aid in its construction. We find that there were 4,000,000 acres of the State land, amounting to $1,000,000 in value, sold for the benefit of this company. These facts are all in this record—sold for the benefit of this company and for its debts; and yet the very men who created those debts, the very men who owned the stock of the company for which they have never paid, became the purchasers of this property, and this vast fund, dedicated to education, to the education of the children of the State, was lost and the property has remained in their hands as their property subject to their ownership; and while these consolidated roads cost about six or seven million dollars, they have bonded them in one form and another, according to the report of the receiver filed in the circuit court, the record of which I have here in my hand, for $18,000,000; and they have 300 miles of completed road subject to this bonded debt, and all this money paid for its construction, and whether they paid anything or not I do not know, but certainly this property was constructed out of the public money, out of the swamp and overflowed lands donated by the United States to the State, and they have 300 miles of road; and why now should you make a new grant in the Interior Department and give to them that which the State refused to give them?

Mr. President, I ask the consideration of the Senate upon this subject. I think if there is anything that should require Senators upon their oaths to perform their duty it is a question of this kind, and I think these chairs should not be vacant when the public interest demands of Senators here that they should give their attention to public business.

Here is an alienation of public lands of the United States given without consideration, without authority of law, without even the pretense of a right or of any action by the State, under the pretense that the twenty-first section of the internal-improvement act gave them a right which thirty years ago, in 1858, all the constituted authorities of the State denied, the attorney-general, the governor, the Legislature, and vested the right in another company which never constructed the road, or a line or a mile or a yard of it, and which has expired years and years ago, the Legislature itself coming to Congress and acknowledging the fact and asking for the revival of the grant upon the condition that this road, now selling the homesteads and property of these people, should not have the advantages of the grant. I think if that is not a case in which the Senators who are elected here to perform a sworn duty should give their attention, none can be found.

Mr. President, I ask now that this resolution may be amended. I am informed that there have been cases here in which, upon the direction of the Senate, the Attorney-General has instituted suits to protect the public property of the United States. I am informed that the Committee on Public Lands will not object to so much of this resolution as directs the Attorney-General to institute the proper proceedings to prevent the sale of the lands in this grant, and that they will be content if I will refer to them the first section of the resolution with the papers, asking for the forfeiture of this grant, and ask for the passage of the second part of it, instructing the Attorney-General to institute proceedings. I will therefore move to amend the joint resolution by striking out the word "joint," leaving it a Senate resolution, and ask the reference of the first section to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair). The proposition of the Senator from Florida will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 1 of the joint resolution, so that it will then read:

That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit, through the district attorneys of the United States, for an injunction against the Florida Navigation and Railway Corporation, or their agents, attempting to sell, or selling, or advertising for sale the lands of the United States embraced in the grant made to the State of Florida under the act entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said States," approved May 17, 1856, while bills for the forfeiture of the same shall be pending before Congress, which have been or shall be recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. INGALLS. With the consent of the Senator from Florida, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Florida. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the pending resolution to strike out the first section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the second section.

Mr. MORGAN. I move the reference of that to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I hope that will not be done. There is pressing necessity if any action be taken at all that it be at once; and it was at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands that I proposed to put the second section on its passage without the other. This land is about to be sold and these people turned out of their homes. When I produce the records here and show beyond any possibility of doubt that there never was any grant made to this railroad company by the State of Florida, when I show that the grant was to the State of Florida, when I show that it was denied to the company by the State, why allow it to advertise and sell quantities of this land containing the homes of these people and involve them in litigation and alarm them and break them up?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Florida if he has not a bill pending now before the Senate for the forfeiture of this grant?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir; I have a bill referred to your committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands if that is the bill that has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the one that the Senator says is now pending before the committee?

Mr. PLUMB. What is the question?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Florida says there is a bill now pending before the Committee on Public Lands for the forfeiture of this land grant. Is that the same bill which has been referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. PLUMB. As far as I know, it is the same bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Has any answer come from the Commissioner?

Mr. PLUMB. Here is an answer which has come back.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to have it read.

Mr. PLUMB. I have it here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper called for by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1886.

SIR: I am in receipt by Departmental reference of the 24th instant, requesting an early report of my views on Senate bill 871, of a letter from Hon. P. B. PLUMB, of the 18th instant, transmitting said bill for further report thereon, additional to report of the 16th instant.

The bill, by its title, purports to be "A bill for the forfeiture of the land granted to the State of Florida for the construction of certain lines of railroad in that State."

The grants affected by the bill are presumed to be those made by the act of May 17, 1856 (11 Stat., 15).

The first section declares in terms an absolute forfeiture of all lands granted by said act, none of the roads provided for having been constructed as entire roads within the time specified in the act. A proviso to this section allows indemnity selections to be made from the forfeited lands in lieu of lands earned by construction before the expiration of said time, and which could not, before that period, be found along the completed portions of the road.

The proviso suggests a doubt as to the extent of the forfeiture declared in the enacting clause, since it would not be consistent to suppose that Congress intended to declare the forfeiture of lands within granted limits along portions of road constructed prior to the expiration of the grant and at the same time to allow indemnity elsewhere for lands excepted out of the grant.

The more serious objection to the first section is that it increases the original grant by providing indemnity to a greater extent than allowed by the original act.

1. By the terms of the original act indemnity is allowed only for lands sold or to which pre-emption rights attached prior to definite location. Indemnity is not allowed for lands reserved at date of grant or otherwise granted, or where from the intervention of lakes and rivers or otherwise there was no land in place or less than full technical sections within the specified odd sections granted. Under the proviso to the first section of the proposed act it would be claimed, and perhaps justly, that indemnity to the full amount of the nominal quantity of lands supposed to be embraced in the specified number of sections should be allowed. This would be giving indemnity for lands included in private land grants or claims, for swamp lands previously granted to the State, for lands granted for other railroads, and for lands that did not exist. It is especially provided in the granting act "that any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or for any other purpose whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operation of this act except as to right of way."

The proposed act makes a new and additional grant of indemnity lands in place of reserved lands which were thus expressly excepted "from the operation" of the original grant.

The amount of land in odd-numbered sections on the line of the Florida Railroad between Fernandino and Waldo, which was not granted to the State by the act of 1856 by reason of prior and contemporary grants and reservations, and otherwise, for which indemnity was not given, is estimated at about 150,000 acres. The proposed act, therefore, makes a new grant to that amount for so much of that road. Probably an equal amount is in the same manner made the subject of an additional grant by this bill for that portion of the Pensacola and Georgia road that was constructed within the time prescribed for the completion of the whole line.

2. The indemnity provided by the bill is to be taken from lands along the portions of road unconstructed at date of the expiration of the grants, where, if indemnity had been allowed for prior grants, reservations, &c., there would be no right under the original act to supply such deficiencies arising along the constructed portions of the road. For example, whatever indemnity right might have existed along the branch line of the Florida Railroad to Cedar Keys must have been satisfied on that line, if at all, and could not be taken under the original act along the Tampa Bay portion of the line, but the proposed bill allows this to be done.

The inconsistency of increasing a grant that is proposed to be forfeited is apparent. If there is reason for declaring a forfeiture of the grant for failure of construction, there would seem to be no reason for enlarging the amount to be retained beyond the amount heretofore granted for the constructed portions of the roads.

The second section of the bill opens forfeited lands to private cash entry and to homestead entry without residence. It is provided that a person entering said land under the homestead laws, or purchasing the same for cash, shall make oath that he intends the land for actual settlement and improvement, and that if he fails to enter upon and improve the same in twelve months from the time of making said entry the land shall be subject to forfeiture, and the money paid for the same shall be returned to the entryman.

A person can easily make oath as to his intention without danger of incurring the penalties of perjury. Besides, it is to be observed that he is not required to swear to an intention to use the land for his own settlement and improvement. Again, nothing in the nature of residence is required. He has merely to "enter upon and improve the same" in twelve months. A visit to the land is "entering upon it," and the slightest act is an "improvement." If he steps upon the land once and digs a hole in the ground, or cuts a bush, he has complied with the law, and receives title to the land upon payment of homestead fees and commissions, or, as the case may be, the minimum price of the land. If he fails to make even that ostensible "entry and improvement" within twelve months and his entry should be contested or set aside he gets back the money he has paid. So he runs no risk of loss of money or of prosecution.

The bill, to the extent of the application of the second section, overthrows the principle of the homestead laws by allowing homestead entries to be made in the manner thus provided, and gives away the lands without conditions of inhabitancy and permanent improvement.

The third section amends the general homestead laws by limiting the period of residence and improvement to three years instead of five years, as now provided, thus increasing the liability of fraudulent entries and facilitating the acquisition of lands for speculative purposes, and in large quantities by corporations and associations.

The fourth section further modifies the general homestead laws, waives the conditions upon which the entries were made, and eliminates the requirement of residence upon lands heretofore entered under those laws by allowing the purchase of the land at $1.25 per acre, whether the parties making the entries have resided on the land or not.

The evils which have followed the act of June 15, 1880, are well known to the Senate committee. I inclose herewith a copy of a letter from Senator PLUMB upon this subject, which was referred by you to this office some time since. The pending bill magnifies the evils complained of in Senator PLUMB's letter. It would amount to a legislative condonement of illegal and fraudulent entries en masse, and utterly destroy all the limitations and safeguards of the homestead laws.

The fifth section gives purchasers from the railroad companies title to the lands so purchased by them, and provides for the institution of suits at the expense of the United States for the recovery, for their benefit, of the purchase-money paid with interest and damages, the United States to retain $1.25 per acre out of the amount so recovered.

This section makes the United States responsible to purchasers from railroad companies in violation of the principles of law which require vendees to look to their vendors for indemnification for failure of title.

Purchasers from railroad companies are not innocent purchasers. They purchase with notice of the liability of failure of title, and have neither legal nor equitable claim against the United States. If they are actual settlers on the land they are protected, as such, by general laws, in event of an enforcement of the forfeiture of the grants. To go further than this is, in my opinion, to go beyond the requirements of justice to individuals and beyond the bounds of fidelity to public interests.

The sixth section is based upon the same erroneous principle, and is open to the same objections as the fifth section, and is equally unnecessary for any good purpose. If town-sites have been established upon lands to which the railroad title fails, the inhabitants can make town-site entries under the public town-site laws, and neither speculative purchasers from the railroad companies nor any other persons can take their lands or municipal improvements from them.

It is my opinion that Senate bill 871, being faulty in the several respects mentioned, should not, in its present form, receive favorable consideration, but that a forfeiture of the grants mentioned in the bill ought to be declared, and I respectfully suggest that a simple declaration of such forfeiture is all that is necessary to that end.

Senator PLUMB's letter and accompanying papers herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment-stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States, under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto.

Mr. CALL. I hope we shall be allowed to finish the subject which has been under consideration. It will not take a great while now. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not consent. I want the matter to go to the Committee on Public Lands. If the Senator will consent to refer it to the committee, we can have a report here on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over until Monday.

Mr. CALL. I am anxious to have this matter disposed of. I move that the bill in charge of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] be informally laid aside.

Mr. MORGAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. CALL. I move to proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution which has been pending. I ask that unanimous consent be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending bill is Senate bill S. 372.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that that may be the order of business for 2 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CALL. I move to proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution, which I have a right to do, I believe, notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 98) relative to the forfeiture of certain lands granted to the State of Florida to aid in the construction of a line of road from Fernandina to Tampa Bay, Florida.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know whether the effect of that motion would be to displace the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It displaces the unfinished business if adopted.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very willing to yield——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order on this motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The question being put, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CALL. I ask for a division.

Mr. INGALLS. Perhaps I did not understand the request of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moved to displace the pending bill, which is the unfinished business, by the resolution which has been under discussion before 2 o'clock.

Mr. INGALLS. For the purpose of enabling him to continue his remarks?

Mr. CALL. No; I desire to have the resolution disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. Has the Senator from Florida finished the observations he desired to submit?

Mr. CALL. I have not. I am ready to go further.

Mr. INGALLS. That will control me. If he desires to continue his remarks I shall vote to take up his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order on this motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state that I have the floor now on this proposition. The Senator from Florida had yielded the floor and I have the floor on the resolution.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. INGALLS. Sufficient debate ought to be had to enable us to understand what we are called upon to vote for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida now asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to discuss the pending proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is to be further discussion of this matter, I claim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. CALL. I did not ask unanimous consent to proceed with my remarks. I asked unanimous consent to be heard on this motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama object to the request now made by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. MORGAN. It is against the rule. I make the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the Chair must insist that debate is not in order. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution named by him, on which he has asked for a division.

Mr. CALL. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn, and the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 372) to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto, is before the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed that when it adjourned to-day it should be to meet on Monday next, on which motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I, Mr. President.

Mr. INGALLS. I make this motion at the request of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate determined that when it shall adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. Is the call for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Allison,	Conger,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Blair,	Dolph,	Morgan,	Williams,
Call,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chace,	Frye,	Payne,
Cheney,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,

NAYS—28.

Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Miller,
Cullom,	Kenna,	Sherman,

So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

WETMORE & BROTHER.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion until I can ask to have a case which has been on the Calendar recommitted to a committee.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the motion for the moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that Order of Business 223, being the bill (S. 211) for the relief of Wetmore & Brother, of Saint Louis, Mo., be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, together with the accompanying report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves to recommit to the Committee on Claims the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and nine minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 24, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 21, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BATTLE SWORD OF CAPT. SAMUEL C. REID.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a communication addressed to me by Mr. Samuel C. Reid, who offers to the United States the battle sword (now in my custody) of his father, Capt. Samuel Chester Reid, who commanded the United States private-armed brig General Armstrong, at the battle of Fayal, in September, 1814.

I respectfully recommend that appropriate action be taken by Congress for the acceptance of this gift.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 20, 1887.

BOOKS, ETC., FOR LIBRARY OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting an additional estimate of appropriations for the purchase of books and manuscripts for the library of the Department of State; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PARTING AND REFINING OF BULLION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Director of the Mint recommending certain legislation in the matter of parting and refining of bullion, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the secretary of the National Board of Health, and inclosing estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the salaries and expenses of the board for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State in regard to the destruction of the monument marking the western initial point in the boundary between the United States and Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR AT VAN BUREN, ARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information concerning the changes which have recently occurred in the harbor at Van Buren, Ark., affecting navigation and facilities for commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

PLUM POINT AND LAKE PROVIDENCE REACHES, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter transmitting a communication from the Mississippi River Commission, with a report and accompanying maps, showing the bank lines of the Plum Point and Lake Providence Reaches; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General in further response to the House resolution calling for a report of the amount due the several commissioners to ascertain flowage damages caused by the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. The vote upon agreeing to the report of the conference committee on the interstate-commerce bill is to be taken this morning in accordance with the agreement entered into yesterday.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that it is not in order to move to recommit the bill. I desire to ask this question of the Speaker, whether it would be in order by unanimous consent to take a separate vote upon the fourth section which relates to the long and short haul?

The SPEAKER. Of course the vote can be in any way by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take a separate vote upon the commission feature, and the Federal court clause.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. You had better swallow it whole.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I would ask whether a vote in the negative, which would send this bill back to the committee of conference, would be considered as a vote against the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House refuses to agree to the report of the conference committee the regular order of proceeding would be to ask a further conference with the Senate, which, as a matter of course, is always granted.

Mr. STEELE. Then in that event this objectionable section could be stricken from the bill—the section which everybody objects to?

The SPEAKER. The committee of conference would be privileged to report back anything upon which they may agree.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I would like to ask a parliamentary question—whether or not a vote on concurring, or if it is not carried rather, whether there will be a vote on the final passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. If the House agrees to the report of the conference committee it closes the matter and the bill is passed. If the House refuses to accept the report a further conference would follow, as heretofore stated by the Chair.

Mr. LONG. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONG. In case we vote not to adopt the report of the conference committee a new committee of conference is to be appointed, I understand. In that case, would not the committee report be privileged and have a right to be presented at any time?

The SPEAKER. It would. It would have precisely the same status as the present report.

Mr. CRISP. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the ruling made by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], I propose to move that this bill be recommitted to the committee, and on that point I desire to be heard.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not make any ruling, but the Chair did. I only asked as to the possibility of a separate vote, by unanimous consent, on the long and short haul feature.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, the gentleman raised the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] moves to recommit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND. On that I make the point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. On the point of order I desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. There is a point of order pending before the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] is on the floor.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My parliamentary inquiry is directed to that, and it is this: That the House on yesterday, by unanimous consent, agreed that a vote should be taken this morning.

The SPEAKER. Still the point is made, and the gentleman desires to be heard.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But that is in violation of the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but it is a matter of argument.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that debate is not in order now even on a point of order after the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. The previous question has been ordered on the adoption of this report. All questions incidental to that are covered by it, and no debate can be allowed upon it relating to the question upon which the previous question has been ordered. Otherwise it is manifest there could never be any limit to discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any rule or practice of the House which prevents the Chair from hearing the views of gentlemen upon questions of order simply because the measure pending before the House is under the operation of the previous question. The point of order is an independent question; but the Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois, or to be referred to any ruling referring to the point.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will furnish it to the Chair in a few moments.

Mr. DUNHAM. I have made this motion to recommit for two reasons: First, because I know it to be the desire of a large number of the members of this House that they should have an opportunity of voting directly on this fourth section. Second, the point of order is made that it can not be recommitted to the committee of conference. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] gives no reason for his point of order, and leaves me to construe his reason to be as I have stated.

Mr. McCREARY (interrupting). I make the point of order upon the gentleman now addressing the Chair that he is discussing the merits of the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] makes the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do mean to discuss the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor to discuss the point of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I propose to speak exclusively on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now send to the desk the authority I referred to awhile ago. I ask the Clerk to read clause 3 of Rule XVII.

The Clerk read as follows:

All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is correct. The Chair had overlooked this provision of the rule; but it is somewhat doubtful whether that clause of the rule does not relate exclusively to incidental questions of order arising directly out of the proposition upon which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report.

Mr. DUNHAM. I failed to hear the point of order made by my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] made the point of order that after the previous question had been ordered on the pending proposition all incidental points of order made must be decided without debate.

Mr. REED. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is that his colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] can not discuss the question of order at this stage.

Mr. REED. What is the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] desires to discuss?

The SPEAKER. The point of order was, that the motion to recommit is not in order. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] insist on his motion?

Mr. DUNHAM. I insist on my motion to recommit, because I desire to get a direct vote on this question of the long and the short haul.

The SPEAKER. At the last session of Congress a committee of conference was appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill known as the interstate-commerce bill. That committee, as the House has been officially notified, has reported to the Senate, and its report has been agreed to by that body. After that action of the Senate, the report of the committee of conference was made to this body, and is now before the House for consideration, and the previous question has been ordered upon it.

In the first place, a motion to recommit is a motion to recommit to the entire committee of conference, as a matter of course, and not merely to the managers on the part of the House. But there is in fact no committee of conference on this bill now in existence—the whole committee having reported to the Senate, and the Senate having disposed of the report, the committee was dissolved, so far as the Senate is concerned, the general rule being that a select committee is dissolved by its report. Otherwise, a select committee once created would become of necessity a standing committee, and matters could be constantly referred to it, notwithstanding it had fully reported upon the particular matter which it was originally formed to consider.

In addition to that the Chair is not aware of any parliamentary law or practice which authorizes the recommitment of a conference report. The consideration of conference reports is governed by different rules, in many respects, from all other legislative proceedings in the House. Such reports can not be laid on the table, as has been frequently decided, nor can they be amended, as has also been frequently decided; and the only question which can be taken upon them is to agree to them as an entirety or to postpone their consideration, for the obvious reason that a refusal to agree is of itself substantially equivalent to a commitment to another conference committee, the old one being dissolved by its report to the two Houses. The motion to recommit, therefore, the Chair thinks is out of order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I make this motion to recommit because it has been held twice at least in another place that it was in order in a legislative body. I ask the Chair if it is not proper to recommit this bill, and, if the conference committee has expired, how it happens under the rules of the House that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], as a member of the conference committee, has had entire charge and control of this report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that under the uniform practice of the House the gentlemen composing the committee which had a measure under consideration and reported it are first recognized for the purpose of speaking upon and managing the measure on the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a suggestion. The Speaker evidently sees the embarrassment of many members who propose to vote for this bill but who do not approve of its provisions. Is there not some practical way by which those gentlemen can free themselves from that embarrassment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated what the effect of a refusal to agree to the report would be.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. Would it be in order for gentlemen to vote "no" and non-concur in this report, and then if it is carried jump over and vote "aye" to please their constituents?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be in order.

Mr. CRISP. I call for the yeas and nays on the question of agreeing to the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 41, not voting 58; as follows:

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. CRISP. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. BRUMM and Mr. SOWDEN objected, and the names were read.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in behalf of my colleague, Mr. THROCKMORTON, that if he were present he would vote "aye." I desire to make a similiar statement also with reference to my colleague Judge REAGAN.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am paired on this question; otherwise I should vote "aye."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. BLAND, has been called home by illness in his family. If he were present he would vote "ay."

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. COBB, is detained at home by illness.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SNYDER, is absent by leave of the House; if he were present he would vote "aye."

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I have voted "aye" on this call; but I desire to state that had I had an opportunity I would have voted to strike out the fourth section of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCK (before the announcement of the result). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. BUCK. I was in the Hall before the roll-call closed.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he was in the Hall when his name was called, he is entitled to have his vote recorded.

Mr. BUCK. No; I was not. I was inside of the Hall while the roll-call was still going on, but I did not hear my name called.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important vote, and as the gentleman was in the Hall before the conclusion of the roll-call, I ask unanimous consent that his vote be recorded.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that unless a gentleman responds on the second roll-call, the Chair shall not thereafter even entertain a request for unanimous consent to record the vote; but, under that rule, a practice has grown up in the House by which gentlemen who state that they were in their seats during the roll-call and failed to hear their names called are permitted to vote, upon the idea that there is at times so much confusion in the Hall that it is difficult or impossible for members to hear the call.

Mr. BUCK. I was inside of the Hall during the roll-call, but did not hear my name.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he was in the Hall, but did not hear his name. If there be no objection his vote will be recorded.

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Hall when my name was called, because I had been informed that the vote would not be taken until 1 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to vote.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule it is not in order for the Chair to entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. KING. If I were permitted to vote I should vote "aye."

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts. My colleague Mr. WHITING is paired. If present, he would vote "no."

The following named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. ATKINSON.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. LAIRD.
Mr. BLAND with Mr. JAMES.
Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HISCOCK.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.
Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. WHITING.
Mr. REESE with Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska.
Mr. CANDLER with Mr. WEST.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. SWINBURNE.
Mr. FORNEY with Mr. PAYNE.
Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BURLEIGH.
Mr. COBB with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.
Mr. VIELE and Mr. DAVENPORT were announced as paired until January 24.

The following named members were announced as paired on the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. HANBACK. If present Mr. SNYDER would vote for the bill and Mr. HANBACK against it.

Mr. STONE, of Massachusetts, with Mr. DAVIS. If present Mr. STONE would vote for the bill and Mr. DAVIS against it.

Mr. MERRIMAN with Mr. BACON. If present Mr. MERRIMAN would vote for the bill and Mr. BACON against it.

Mr. GLASS with Mr. O'HARA. If present Mr. GLASS would vote for the bill and Mr. O'HARA against it.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. BINGHAM. If present Mr. CLARDY would vote for the bill and Mr. BINGHAM against it.

Mr. WISE with Mr. NEGLEY. If present Mr. WISE would vote "aye" and Mr. NEGLEY "no."

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. GUENTHER.
Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. BUCHANAN.
Mr. KLEINER with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I notice that I am announced as paired with Mr. BLAND. I voted for the bill; but as I am paired, I will withdraw my vote.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. BROWNE] is absent on account of his own illness and severe illness in his family.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I send to the desk a conference report and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 229) making appropriation for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out the words "one hundred and fifty" and inserting the words "two hundred" in lieu thereof, and that the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 3.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
JAMES T. JOHNSTON,
W. D. OWEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM MAHONE,
G. G. VEST,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the House conferees, which accompanies this report, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The managers on the part of the House in the conference upon the disagreeing votes of the Senate and House of Representatives upon the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., present the following statement in explanation of the conference report:

The Senate bill proposed the expenditure of $200,000 for purchase of site and erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C. The House passed the bill, reducing the amount to $150,000, and also amending by insertion of a provision providing that estimates shall be made so as to insure that the building be completed within the limit prescribed before purchase of site, so that after paying for site, the balance, according to the estimates, should suffice for the erection of the building; also amending so that the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States should have the exception, allowing full administration of criminal laws and service of civil process.

The effect of the action of the conference committee is to restore the amount originally passed by the Senate, and to adopt the other House amendments as to the safeguards around the expenditure and the right of the State to administer criminal law and to serve civil process on the site when purchased by the United States.

SAMUEL DIBBLE,
THO. D. JOHNSTON,
W. D. OWEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF LIFE ON PASSENGER STEAM-CARS, ETC.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the following resolution of inquiry, introduced on the 10th instant by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, reported the same back, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to make inquiries of constructors of passenger cars and of steamboats, and of any other persons whom he may think especially capable of giving useful information upon the subject, as to the best methods of constructing and of heating the same, especially of heating the former and constructing the latter, so as to prevent the loss of life and property by fire; also that he communicate to the House at the next regular meeting of Congress so much of the communications he may receive, with plans and drawings, if any, as he may think of value to Congress, with a view to legislation looking to the protection of property and life, together with such views and recommendations as he may see fit to express.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN VESSELS IN CANADIAN PORTS.

Mr. BELMONT submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House copies of such correspondence, up to the present day, between this Government and the British Government as he may decide can now properly be made public, in regard to the deprivation inflicted in Canadian ports on American fishing vessels having the right to touch and trade, of the liberty heretofore enjoyed by such vessels to enter Canadian ports open to foreign vessels and buy and sell, and to transmit merchandise therein, and which is permitted in such ports to American trading vessels and to vessels of all other nationalities.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. SKINNER. I now call up for consideration the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes. This report was read on a previous day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of the report. This is a very important bill.

Mr. PERKINS. And there is a brief statement of the conferees which perhaps had better be read.

The report of the committee of conference, together with the statement of the House conferees (as published in House proceedings of Tuesday the 18th instant), was read.

Mr. SKINNER. I move the adoption of this report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SKINNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF HON. JAMES W. REID.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication; which was laid on the table:

RALEIGH, N. C., January 20, 1887.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the resignation of Hon. James B. Reid as a member of the Forty-ninth Congress from the fifth Congressional district of North Carolina was, on the 5th day of January, 1887, received and accepted by me.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. M. SCALES,
Governor of North Carolina.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By special order of the House, this day, after the morning hour, is set apart for the consideration of Senate bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WILLIS. Before the House enters on the execution of that order I ask that, where there is upon the Calendar a House bill and also a Senate bill, identical with it in terms, the House bill shall be taken up and the Senate bill substituted. There are only a few such cases.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I do not object if it does not include the next bill in which I am interested, and which I desire to be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STRAIT. Yes; I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

JACOB SMITH.

Mr. ELLSBERRY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back a bill (S. 2111) granting a pension to Jacob Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A bill (H. R. 7934) granting a pension to Martin Smiley;
A bill (H. R. 3932) to grant a pension to John N. Pennell;
A bill (H. R. 7539) granting a pension to John Albrecht;
A bill (H. R. 6808) granting a pension to Barny H. Riepe;
A bill (H. R. 6809) granting a pension to John R. Herron;
A bill (H. R. 3536) granting a pension to Jonathan D. Young; and A bill (H. R. 3934) to grant a pension to Lucinda Burke.

DR. SABIN STOCKING.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment a bill (H. R. 9143) granting a pension to Dr. Sabin Stocking; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY MARTIN.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back a bill (H. R. 2232) granting a pension to Mary Martin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

L. B. TOWNSEND AND OTHERS.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported back a bill (S. 2126) for the relief of L. B. Townsend, Louis S. Lovell, W. C. Page, Alonzo Sessions, Hampton Rich, Harvey Harter, Benjamin Harter, and Peter Hackett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely a bill (S. 1455) for the relief of Ernest H. Wardwell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying adverse report, ordered to be printed.

SAINT DOMINIC'S CHURCH.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (H. R. 10414) for the relief of Saint Dominic's church, in the District of Columbia; which was laid on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, also reported back a bill (H. R. 10799) for the relief of Saint Dominic's church in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICE, WYOMING.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on the Territories, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. 10358) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Wyoming, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FORESTER H. M'BRIDE.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10427) granting a pension to Forester H. McBride; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. BARNES.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 2687) granting a pension to William B. Barnes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. M. E. WOODS.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 2997) granting a pension to Mrs. M. E. Woods; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRAGG, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2936) for the relief of George M. Ochiltree; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

JAMES CROOKS AND OTHERS.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 10800) for the relief of the legal representatives of James Crooks and William Crooks, of Canada; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS' HOME, MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10801) ceding to the State of Minnesota Fort Ripley Military Reservation for the purpose of erecting and maintaining a soldiers' home therein; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

W. H. POWELL.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 269) for the relief of W. H. Powell.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill was under consideration when the committee rose on last Friday, the pending question being on the motion to lay the bill aside with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWAY A. GRANT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 267) for the relief of Edway A. Grant.

The bill was read.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the matter covered by this bill having been disposed of in the Department, I ask that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FREDERICK W. RUGGLES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 187) for the relief of Frederick W. Ruggles, of Westport, Nova Scotia.

Mr. LYMAN. This, Mr. Chairman, is an adverse report, and I move that this bill be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SEWELL COULSON AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 249) for the payment of Sewell Coulson and Porter, Harrison & Fishback for legal services.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Sewell Coulson the sum of $3,950, and to Porter, Harrison & Fishback the sum of $2,500, for legal services rendered by them (as recommended and approved by the Judge-Advocate-General and Secretary of War) in defending ex-officers and ex-soldiers for acts done by them in obedience to the orders of a superior officer of the United States Army, in Indiana, during the late war.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. SPRINGER) is as follows:

This bill is precisely the same in text as House bill 7409, already reported favorably by this committee, as will appear by Report No. 1377 of this session, which report is adopted as the report on the Senate bill, the passage of which is recommended in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I feel some delicacy in opposing the passage of this bill or a favorable recommendation by this committee to the House. Every consideration impels me not to do so. When I say every consideration, I mean almost every consideration except a feeling of justice which arises in my mind and compels me to state the facts in regard to the claim.

Probably I am as familiar with the facts as it is possible for any one to be, considering that the claim is an old one, that it originated during the days of the war, when I was but a mere boy. I feel in justice to this House that I ought to give the facts, in order that the House may take the responsibility, and I myself be entirely relieved.

The facts are these: During the war, the latter days of the war, the conspirators in Indiana, among whom was Andrew Humphreys, who resided in the county in which I was born and raised, and at that time resided, were arrested by a company of militia from the county of Sullivan and taken to Indianapolis. He was tried before the same court that tried Milligan and Harsey, and of course you are all familiar with the judgment of the court.

The same sentence was not visited upon Mr. Humphreys as was visited on the other prisoners indicted and tried. He was released, sent home, and confined simply to two townships of the county.

After the war was over, after things had settled down and the excitement had passed away, Mr. Humphreys brought his suit in the Sullivan circuit court against the parties, who had arrested him, for damages. A motion was made to transfer the cause to the Federal court, under the statute provided for such cases. That was the only defense by the parties against whom the suit was brought. The motion was overruled by the circuit court. No further defense was made in the case. After—I have no doubt—a very eloquent speech by Senator VOORHEES, the jury retired, and with the bitterness that had been engendered during the war still rankling in their bosoms, brought in a verdict for $25,000 damages. The case was taken to the supreme court upon the error in the record in failing or refusing to transfer the cause to the Federal court.

Porter, Harrison & Fishback for the first time appeared in the cause in the supreme court. They filed a brief, and I am sorry I have not the brief here. I have it at my room. It presented the one single fact, that the motion to transfer to the Federal court ought to have been granted. That was the only question argued. It was not a difficult legal proposition; nor was it a very intricate question. The supreme court reversed the judgment upon that error, and the case was remanded to the lower court.

The cause was immediately transferred to the Federal court, and it was never further prosecuted, but was dismissed.

That, I say, was the only service rendered by Porter, Harrison & Fishback as counsel in the case. For filing that brief they were paid by the governor of the State of Indiana $550, which I think was a reasonable compensation. They now come in and ask for $2,500 more.

So far as Mr. Coulson is concerned, I was personally acquainted with him and knew his standing as an attorney. It was very good for a local attorney. He was regarded as a good local lawyer. But it is known that at that day in my State large fees were not paid for even large services rendered by local attorneys. Mr. Coulson was employed as local attorney. He was the local attorney who filed the motion for the transfer to the Federal court. He entered an appearance in the other cases that were filed at the same time. They all turned on the same question, and the whole question was settled in this one case which went to the Federal court. But in addition to these cases indictments were returned against some of the persons that were engaged at that time as militia for the larceny of a couple of kegs of powder that were found secreted under a building. Now, no attorney of any standing will claim that those indictments grew out of anything more or less than the excitement and prejudice engendered by the war. There never was the least foundation for a prosecution for larceny. But the indictments were returned; a change of venue was taken in those cases to the Knox circuit court. There, I believe, the prosecutions were dismissed. Nothing was done. So that the whole service rendered by Mr. Coulson was the presentation of a motion in the case brought by Mr. Humphreys for the transfer of the cause to the Federal court and the presentation of motions in the other cases for changes of venue. In the other cases the causes were transferred and then dismissed. For that service Mr. Coulson received the sum of $500, or about $100 for each case. It is now proposed to pay to him nearly $4,000. I say that, estimating it by what Mr. Coulson has received during his whole practice, the sum of $100 in each of those cases was a liberal fee, and probably as much as he ever received for a similar service.

The proposition is simply to pay to these attorneys nearly $8,000 in addition to the sum of $1,050 paid them by the State of Indiana. It is somewhat remarkable, somewhat singular, that this claim has lain for twenty years and has never been brought forward and advocated in this House before. At least it has never approached so near the point of payment.

Mr. STEELE. My colleague is probably not aware that this case was considered in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Adversely in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. BYNUM. Adversely in the Forty-eighth Congress, I understand. I simply know, Mr. Chairman, that the case has never been seriously pressed until this time. Now, as I have said, considering my relations with these parties, I have been loth to oppose the passage of this bill; but I believed it was a duty I owed to my constituents and to this House to make a statement of the facts.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Can the gentleman tell us whether there has been any report upon this bill by a committee of this House?

Mr. BYNUM. They have simply adopted the Senate report. There is one other point, Mr. Chairman, to which I would like to call attention. I notice that in the Senate report statements are filed by distinguished attorneys of Indiana, among them, I believe, ex-Senator McDonald and the late Vice-President. I simply desire to say that I believe no attorney has ever gone into court with a claim for fees without being able to have its reasonableness amply sustained by the testimony of other members of the bar. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand the gentleman [Mr. BYNUM] to say that the State of Indiana has already paid these gentlemen.

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir; a thousand and fifty dollars.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] calls my attention to the fact that I have not stated the length of the brief filed by these gentlemen. It is a brief presenting the single point of the right of the defendants to have the cause transferred to the Federal court, and in addition to the pleadings it contains about fourteen pages of argument.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am animated by a good deal of the same feeling as my colleague in coming to the discussion of the merits of this bill. Mr. Coulson, one of the parties, lived in my Congressional district; I knew him a long time before his death; I know his family now; and to enter into a thorough discussion of this question as to its merits and demerits might, perhaps, harrow up some feelings that we would not wish to harrow up now. The facts in the case are these:

Under an act of the General Assembly of Indiana passed in 1861, authorizing the muster of militia, there was a militia company duly organized in Sullivan County, and sworn into the State service according to law. During the progress of the war there were some men in that county who did not believe it was their duty to obey the laws of the General Government, and when a draft was ordered they resisted it to some extent. My colleague says that this home militia arrested some men who were engaged in that disturbance. He does not go quite far enough. When the militia made those arrests they were acting under an order of General Alvin P. Hovey, the United States officer in command of the district of Indiana; they were acting under the order of Col. R. W. Thompson, the district provost-marshal; they were acting under the further order of General James Hughes, commanding the State militia; in short, they were standing in the position of soldiers obeying the orders of superior officers, and they made certain arrests by virtue of those orders. They also made certain seizures of ammunition which was found concealed in the houses of the men that were arrested, concealed there for the purpose of arming men to resist the laws of the United States.

In 1866, after the war was over, after peace was declared, after the men who had laid down their arms had been restored to their rights, after the soldiers had returned home, these men who had been arrested brought suit against the men who had arrested them in the circuit court of Sullivan County for false imprisonment. Suits were brought against six or seven men, the captain of the company, and some of the privates in the company, and Mr. Coulson appeared for them as their attorney. He moved to transfer the cases to the United States court under a statute passed by the General Government. Judge Eccles, who occupied the bench, was not in sympathy with those who had made the arrests. I might say some things about him and his course at that time that would not be pleasant, but for the sake of this bill, I forbear. The judge overruled that application, and held that the statute of the United States authorizing the cases to be transferred to the Federal court was unconstitutional. He thus forced these men into a trial in his own court, where the jury was composed of the friends of the plaintiffs, and a verdict was returned of $25,000 damages against the captain, and also a verdict of $500 against one other man.

The defendants then had no remedy but to appeal to the supreme court of the State, and the cases were appealed. There were found concealed in the houses of the plaintiffs munitions of war, powder and lead, that had been stored there for the purpose of resisting the authority of the Government, and the grand jury of that county indicted the parties for grand larceny for taking these munitions of war while acting under the order of the commanding general of the district under the order of the provost marshal, and under the order of the general commanding the State militia, and the same judge ruled that they must answer to that charge also.

When this case went to the supreme court of the State the judgment of the lower court was reversed, the supreme court holding that the act of Congress providing for a transfer of such cases to United States courts was constitutional and that these men were entitled to that right. The cases went back and were certified to the United States court. Porter, Harrison & Fishback came into the cases when they went to the supreme court of the State, and helped attend to them after they were transferred to the Federal court.

Now, my colleague says that he was a young man at that time. I was then twenty years younger than I am now; but I can recollect a great deal about the circumstances, for they occurred only 50 miles from my residence. I will, however, call my colleague's attention to the fact that there are men living who were not young men then—such men as Joseph E. McDonald, Judge Frazier, of the supreme court (and a brighter legal intellect never shed luster upon that bench), and Judge Ray—these gentlemen, together with Mr. Hendricks, now deceased, who after the date of these occurrences was governor and Vice-President, but who was at that time a practicing attorney, were not then young men; and having knowledge of all the circumstances, these gentlemen certify that the fees charged by these attorneys for their services at that time were reasonable.

Mr. HOPKINS. Why did they not collect their fees at the time the service was rendered or soon after?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. They applied to the War Department, but the Judge-Advocate-General refused to recommend the allowance of the fees, because the services were not completed; the cases were still pending. He stated that when the cases were completed he would then consider the matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. After the cases were ended did these attorneys then apply for compensation?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. They then applied to the Department, but it was held, as is shown by the papers here, that there was no means out of which payment could then be made.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Does the gentleman state that Joseph E. McDonald and the late Vice-President Hendricks certified to the correctness of the charges made by these attorneys?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir; they certified that the amount charged was reasonable compensation for the services rendered.

Mr. PETTIBONE. And their certificate to that effect was made at or about the time the services were rendered?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir; Governor Hendricks was an attorney in the case upon the other side and knew all the surroundings of the matter. There is also a certificate from the then governor of Indiana, Mr. Conrad Baker, that he knew all the facts and considered the charge a reasonable one.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman think that their judgment on such matters is as good as that of our colleague?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I do not want to make a comparison of that kind. [Laughter.]

My colleague says that Mr. Coulson was a "local attorney;" but he will not dispute that Mr. Coulson was as good a lawyer as there was in the eighth Congressional district. He was as good a lawyer as many a man who resided at the capital of his State, and is not to be classed as a "local attorney." I know there is a feeling among some men that when they move from one of the counties of Indiana to the capital of the State we lawyers out in the rural districts are merely "local attorneys" and have not brains enough to manage a lawsuit. [Laughter.] But I say, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Coulson lived away from the capital of the State, there was not a better attorney in the Wabash Valley, and but few better at the capital.

These attorneys secured for these men their rights. Those judgments for $30,000 were set aside, as was also the indictment for grand larceny. Now, if those judgments for $30,000 had remained in force, and these men had been compelled to pay them in consequence of acts which they performed under the order of superior officers—acts performed while they were acting under the order of the provost-marshal, and under the order of a general of the Army—if these men had been obliged to pay these judgments rendered under circumstances of that kind, I desire to know whether there is a fair-minded man upon either side of this House who would have refused to make an appropriation to reimburse them. No man who has a conscience would have voted against such a proposition.

Now, these attorneys secured the wiping out of those judgments of $30,000. These cases were pending, as the record shows, for six long years in the several courts before which they were carried. The amount that Congress is now asked to pay for the services of these attorneys is about $6,000; that is all—$3,000 in one instance, and $2,500 in the other. And is a just claim like this to be brushed aside because, forsooth, Sewell Coulson was a "local attorney," when this application is supported by the statement of such men as I have mentioned, Vice-President Hendricks, Senator McDonald, two judges of the Supreme Court, and even Judge Eckels, the man who was so biased against these men that he held the United States statute providing for a transfer of the suits was unconstitutional, and forced them to trial in his court. Judge Eckels himself, after the services had been rendered and the case wound up, declared the fees charged to be only reasonable compensation for the services rendered.

I have no personal interest in this matter. I merely wish to see justice done to the widow and family of a man who had the courage and manhood to stand by these men who were unable to pay him a fee, and secure them their rights after the State court had undertaken to override an act of Congress and deny them the hearing to which they were entitled in a tribunal of the United States. All I ask is an impartial consideration of this application.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana. Upon what ground of law or equity is it contended that the Government is liable for these fees?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Upon the ground that whenever the Government orders a man to do a thing, and he gets into trouble, is subjected to heavy legal expenses in consequence of his act of obedience to the Government, that Government is bound to stand by him and protect him.

In 1868 Congress, having its attention attracted to the matter by the hardship of this very case, passed a law providing that no person acting under the orders of the United States should be liable to damages for an arrest of this kind. Prior to that time there was no such law. And now numbers of cases have been reported from your War Claims Committee, and favorably acted upon by this House, allowing men compensation for their property which had been destroyed by an officer, the citizens having no remedy in a court of justice because the officer was acting under orders.

This is a matter of justice. As I said before, it is an unpleasant matter for me to talk about, and I do not want to enter into all its surroundings and the terrible state of affairs which existed there when these men made the arrest. It is unpleasant to rehearse the facts, how brave men were shot down in the discharge of their duties as Federal officers. I do not want to enter into that, but prefer to stand on the case as recommended by men who knew all the service which was rendered at the time.

I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. ELY. I understand from the discussion of this bill—I never heard of it before it came up here—that these claimants have an equitable claim against the Government. It is claimed too much is charged because they are local attorneys, and, secondly, because of the shortness of the brief filed in the case. Taking the opponents of this bill on these two grounds, I submit, and I think every attorney in this House will agree with me, the length of a brief filed by these attorneys is no measure of the services they rendered. In fact the brevity of the brief may be an indication their service is of greater value than if they had filed one of greater length.

Upon the other point ex-Senator McDonald uses the following language:

INDIANAPOLIS, April 6, 1875.

I was one of the attorneys for Andrew Humphreys and others, plaintiffs in the suits transferred to the United States circuit court, from the time the transfers were made until the suits were ended, and have a personal knowledge of the services rendered in said court by Porter, Harrison & Fishback, and from said personal knowledge and from the record above of proceedings in the several causes, state that the fees charged in the said causes by the several attorneys engaged in the above claim are reasonable and within the rate of usual charges in this State for such services.

J. E. McDONALD.

The late Vice-President Hendricks says:

INDIANAPOLIS, April 7, 1875.

I have examined the statements made by said Porter and Harrison, and had some personal knowledge of the cases, and think the charge of $3,000 reasonable and not above the charges usual among attorneys of the recognized ability of Messrs. Porter, Harrison & Fishback.

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS.

It seems to me that is an answer to the objection made to the passage of this bill.

For one, sir, as a member of the legal profession, and speaking in regard to others to whom I have ever been politically opposed, I repudiate the idea that honorable attorneys will make an assertion of that which is not true for the sake of giving some other attorney a large fee in any cause. This is, sir, a slander upon one of the most honorable professions in this country. It is a slander upon the dead as well as upon the living. It is a slander upon the most honorable and respected citizens of the United States.

And because this opposition to the bill is so weak and frivolous and unfounded I venture to break the silence I have maintained in the House to say this much in favor of a claim which seems to me to be just and reasonable and in defense of the profession of which I am an humble member. [Applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. [Cries of "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee for any great length of time. Members seem to be growing impatient; but I do not desire this House shall lose sight of the main proposition, or that gentlemen shall be carried away by the statement of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] as to the condition of affairs in the State of Indiana at the time these arrests were made.

I concede this man acted legally; I concede all that. I simply base my opposition to this bill upon the ground that these charges are excessive. I think I am familiar with the services which were rendered in the case. I went through the records, and I say to this House, and I know what I am talking about, that Mr. Humphreys never expected any such verdict, and it would never have been rendered under other circumstances than the excitement which prevailed at the time the case was tried in the lower court. He had so little confidence in it that he never even followed the case to the Federal court. It was there dismissed.

Mr. Coulson may have been an excellent attorney, yet his name is not attached to the brief filed in the Supreme Court. There is no name of another individual or firm upon the brief except Porter, Harrison & Fishback.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he regards, as a Representative of the State of Indiana, the opinion of Senator McDonald and of the late Vice-President Hendricks and of two Judges of the Supreme Court as being worthy of consideration as to the value of the legal services in the case?

Mr. BYNUM. I simply say in answer to that, that when I am as familiar with facts as I am in this case I will not yield my opinion to any man as to the value of services rendered.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Did the gentleman attend the trial, and was he a witness of the services which were rendered?

Mr. BYNUM. There was an affidavit filed in the case, but the moment Judge Eckles overruled the motion and held it to be unconstitutional the defense withdrew their appearance and allowed judgment to be taken virtually by default.

Mr. BUCK. What period of time did these proceedings consume?

Mr. BYNUM. They extended over quite a period of time, because our supreme court was behind, and it was delayed there some time; and it also lay in the Federal court some time before it was dismissed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was or was not the practical result of the service rendered by the attorneys this: that the State court upheld its jurisdiction and rendered judgment for $30,000——

Mr. BYNUM. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Twenty-five thousand dollars in one case and five hundred in the other.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, whatever the amount, the services rendered were the reversal of the judgment of the State court and to relieve a citizen from the burden of $30,000 damages.

Mr. BYNUM. That was virtually it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the claim in this case amounts to about the average collection fee on the amount of money involved, to say nothing of the great question involved in the prosecution against a citizen, unconstitutional and illegal, as held by your own State court.

Mr. BYNUM. In answer to the gentleman, there let me say that I do not measure fees in that case, or in any case, by the amount of money involved. The question upon which this case turned in court was not one of fact. If it had been a contest in court upon a question of fact and for the reference of the case to the supreme court upon that question that would probably have been the measure of the services rendered as we measure them in the State of Indiana. But where the whole question turned on one of jurisdiction, and there was no further defense made except the application to transfer the case, and the case went to the supreme court and was reversed upon a pure question of law, I do not think that the amount of recovery has anything in the world to do with the case. And right here permit me to say in this connection that every body conceded the judgment was a result of prejudice rather than the expression of a deliberate judgment of the court or jury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But it would have taken something more than a mere outburst of excitement to pay the verdict.

Mr. BYNUM. My recollection is that the judge would not have hurt the man a great deal any way.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. If I understand the gentleman, he concedes that these persons have an equitable claim against the Government for pay?

Mr. BYNUM. No, sir; I do not concede that they have any claim at all.

Mr. BAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say that the question was a mere one of fees.

Mr. BYNUM. No, sir; the objection I urge is principally that the fee is excessive. I would not object to the Government paying what I conceive to be a reasonable fee, but I do not concede its liability to these parties for a cent.

Mr. BAYNE. What would you regard as a reasonable fee?

Mr. BYNUM. I think the thousand and fifty dollars paid by the State of Indiana was a large fee, and I believe it was intended in full payment.

Mr. GOFF. If I understand the gentleman, he said that the counsel for the defense in the lower court withdrew after the court overruled the plea.

Mr. BYNUM. They did.

Mr. GOFF. Who appeared for the defense in the supreme court of Indiana?

Mr. BYNUM. Porter, Harrison & Fishback.

Mr. GOFF. Who appeared in the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BYNUM. There was no appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It never went there. It was reversed in the supreme court of the State and afterward went to the Federal court, where, after a time, it was dismissed.

Mr. LAFFOON. How much were Porter, Harrison & Fishback paid?

Mr. BYNUM. They were paid $500 or $550.

I do not wish to be understood as making any assertion which would cast discredit upon the ability of that firm, for it is well known that there is not a firm of abler lawyers in the State than they; but I am not here simply to say that because they are able lawyers that the points involved were so intricate and difficult that it required a service of such character as would entitle them to a compensation of $3,000 to liquidate it. I have already said that the entire brief, excluding of course certain documents which were incorporated in it, did not exceed more than fourteen pages, and it was directed solely to one point, that is to the question as to whether that provision of the statute which gave the right of transfer was or was not constitutional. I take it that the amount of legal ability required to hunt up the different authorities and compile them in the shape of a brief would not have been very great. I think the principle was as well established at that time as it is now that it was not the province of the lower court to decide whether the Federal court had jurisdiction or not.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. You would not fix the fee of an attorney by the number of pages of his brief?

Mr. BYNUM. No, sir; not by any means; but I merely meant to say that that was to some extent a criterion as to the amount of labor involved in its preparation. There are, of course, briefs which cover two hundred or three hundred pages, requiring a vast amount of research and labor, but in this case, involving the single point, fourteen pages were sufficient.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Why may not that brief have been worth just as much?

Mr. BYNUM. It does not take so long a time to prepare it. But I say to the gentleman that so far as this brief is concerned it contains nothing more than probably one-half the members of the bar, who are members of this House, could present in two or three days.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Did it not present enough to secure a reversal of the judgment?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly; and the judgment could have been reversed without any brief at all. It did as much good as a simple assignment of errors would have done.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Has not the gentleman known lawyers to lose their cases by presenting too long briefs?

Mr. BYNUM. I will confess to the gentleman that I have. The gentleman may have some experience of that character.

Mr. GEDDES. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEDDES. Is it not a fact that after all these legal services were performed these claimants looked to the State for compensation, and applied to the State for compensation; and after an allowance was made and paid to and received by them, they now come here for additional pay?

Mr. BYNUM. That is the fact. The governor of the State of Indiana had charge of funds ample to pay them a sufficient sum for their services. Governor Baker paid them $1,050. And while I cannot state it as a fact, I believe that was paid as a full compensation for their services.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Is not the statement of Governor Baker on file with the papers in this case, in which he says only $3,000 were appropriated by the Legislature to pay all such claims; that these parties only got their proportion of that amount, and that he did not mean to pay them fully for the services rendered?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir. But it is a singular thing that the receipts signed by them are not made a part of this report. If they had been it would have appeared whether they were receipts in full or otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Why do you not produce your authority for asserting that they were paid in full? That belongs to your side of the case, not to mine.

Mr. BYNUM. In regard to Mr. Coulson's services in this case I have stated that I believe the sum paid to him for his services, about $500, was an adequate compensation. The gentleman from Indiana may talk about Mr. Coulson's legal ability as long as he pleases. I make the assertion, which I do not believe any one will successfully contradict, that able as he may have been, long as he practiced the law in the county in which he resided, the amount in this claim will exceed the amount of the estate he left to his family, although he followed his profession for twenty years.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Do you measure a man's ability by the number of dollars he lays up?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not. But when an able attorney practices law for twenty years he ought to have something more to show in the estate he leaves to his family than a claim against the Government in a single case. I think he would if he were an attorney of very high standing and extensive practice. But I will not undertake to say that there might not perhaps be allowed to these parties something.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. BYNUM. I think the gentleman is taking up too much of my time. He has his own hour and can speak in that.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. My question is, what did Daniel Webster and what did Matt. Carpenter leave?

Mr. BYNUM. In answer to that question I will say I am not well posted as to the estate any one leaves, especially any politician. The gentlemen just named were in politics the most of their lives, and it is pretty well known that those who are engaged in politics never leave very large estates. I may say there is not going to be an exception in my case; I do not know how it is about the gentleman representing the eighth district.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend at the beginning to do more than state the facts in this case and let the House know what the condition of this case was. I am not here for the purpose of making any factious or bitter opposition to the payment of this claim; but I felt it to be my duty to present the facts. I honestly and conscientiously felt that the payment of so large a sum in this case was wrong. Probably to give $1,000 to Porter, Harrison & Fishback, and $500 or $1,000 to Coulson's heirs, because he is now dead, would not be an improper thing. But I do think the payment of $3,900 to Coulson for simply presenting this motion in the lower court and the filing affidavits in three or four cases for larceny, for changes of venue which any justice of the peace could have written, would be exorbitant; and I propose this House when it votes on this question shall vote understandingly.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. If these people have been paid a reasonable compensation, as you allege, why do you now suggest the payment of an additional sum?

Mr. BYNUM. I made the suggestion simply because I would give them something to get rid of the claim.

Mr. GEDDES. In that case, if it is not a just claim against the Government, would it not be better for us to raise the amount here in the House by private subscription?

Mr. BYNUM. I would have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish to answer one question asked by the chairman of the Committee on War Claims. These men never looked to the State of Indiana for payment of their claims; they looked to the General Government, and applied to the General Government, and the Adjutant-General recommended the payment of the claim, but afterwards the State Legislature made an appropriation of $3,000 to pay claims of this character, and that sum was apportioned out among the different claimants by the governor. The governor gave these claimants, as their share, about $800, and certified at the time that it was not accepted by them in full payment or as in any way compensating them for the services they had rendered. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] tell us that he was a boy at the time this claim arose, yet now, twenty years afterwards, he looks through the papers and comes and asks this House to take his version of the matter and his opinion of the value of the services, and to override the certificates of the late Vice-President Hendricks, of Senator McDonald, and of the judges of the Supreme Court who heard the case. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, and the chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 79.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 80.

So the motion of Mr. MCMILLIN was agreed to.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert H. Emery, of Stamford, Conn., in full settlement of all claims, legal or equitable, which he has in any way against the United States on account of the cost of, and the time spent by him, and use of all patents and inventions in designing and constructing the testing-machine built and erected by him for the United States, or otherwise, in any way, on account of said machine, the sum of $200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which sum is hereby appropriated and made immediately available therefor. Said machine, together with the full right to the use therein of all patents and inventions used in its design and construction, shall belong to the United States.

Mr. TRIGG. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the report, and also of the views of the minority.

The report (by Mr. MCKENNA) and the views of the minority were read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 929) for the relief of Albert H. Emery, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

This bill has passed the Senate three times, once for $225,000 and twice as now reported, for $200,000. The facts concerning this case are fully set forth in the Senate Report No. 71, which accompanied this bill, and in which your committee fully concur.

The following is a summary of said report:

(1) That Mr. Emery, the claimant, has invented and furnished to the Government a machine suitable for testing the strength of structural materials, which, according to the judgment of its own officers and the scientific experts of the country, far exceeds in value the amount of the appropriation provided for in this bill.

(2) The cost of the machine the 1st of January, 1880, was shown to be upward of $129,000.

That toward the production of this wonderful machine the Government contributed $31,500 only—so that the machine was built principally at the expense of Mr. Emery; and, in addition to this, he contributed over five years of unremitting labor in designing and constructing the machine and the use of his inventions therein, which had cost him several years of time and the expenditure of large sums of money, not embraced in the above-mentioned amount expended in the construction of the machine; and your committee are assured by the claimant that in connection with the development of these inventions and the construction of this machine he has incurred a large indebtedness, upon which the accruing interest is over a thousand dollars a month, for which it appears that the Government and the people are the only beneficiaries.

"To produce this machine [says General Gillmore in his letter of February, 1882] he not only had to spend the long years which were occupied in its production, but the many previous years of study and very expensive experimental works before he could possibly produce such a machine as this proves to be."

(3) That the real value of this invention to the claimant depends not alone upon the construction of a machine for the use of the Government, but upon the exercise of his right under his patents from the United States to manufacture and sell machines in the general market—a right which the Government could not justly take away or seriously impair unless authorized by the claimant, and for a fair consideration.

(4) That the law of Congress approved June 20, 1878, dedicating this machine to the public use at merely nominal rates, has in a great measure impaired the value of these inventions to the claimant and placed him at such disadvantage that all attempts on his part thus far to realize a profit upon the manufacture and sale of the machines under these extraordinary and expensive inventions have been attended with great pecuniary loss.

(5) The fact that this bill has three times passed the Senate, once for $225,000 and twice for $200,000—in the Forty-eighth Congress, after a full discussion of its provisions, and in this Congress without opposition—and has been three times favorably reported in the House of Representatives, is an indorsement of its merits which ought not to be disregarded by this committee.

Your committee therefore report back the Senate bill and recommend that the same do pass.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned members of the Committee on Claims do not concur with the majority who have determined to report favorably Senate bill 929, for the relief of Albert H. Emery, donating to him $200,000 out of the public Treasury. It is difficult to see how either the Senate or the majority of the Committee on Claims of this House have arrived at their conclusion or upon what figures they based their estimate of $200,000. This case was before this committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, and there, for the first time, seems to have received that careful consideration which it deserved. It is doubted whether the conclusions of that committee were known to the Senate when the matter was pending there, or to the majority of the committee, who report the Senate bill favorably.

The report of this committee of the Forty-eighth Congress was as follows (Report H. R. No. 484), namely:

That Congress, by an act approved March 3, 1873, appropriated $25,000 for improved machinery for testing the strength of iron and steel. Under this act the Ordnance Department made a contract with A. H. Emery, civil engineer, of New York, for a testing-machine to be designed and constructed by him, and erected at the arsenal at Watertown, Mass. The price Mr. Emery was to receive for such a machine was $25,000. Under this contract the evidence shows that Mr. Emery proceeded with the designing and constructing of the machine. While the work was in progress Congress passed an act, approved March 3, 1875, appropriating $50,000 for "experiments in testing iron and steel, including the cost of any machine built for that purpose," and the previous appropriation of $25,000 for a testing-machine was made available as a further sum for the purpose of building the machine. This act also provided that the President should appoint a board, consisting of one engineer and one ordnance officer of the Army, one line officer and one engineer of the Navy, and three civilian experts, for the purpose of making tests of the strength and value of all kinds of iron and steel and other metals, and for the building of a suitable machine for establishing such tests. The President appointed on this board General Q. A. Gillmore, engineer, United States Army; Col. T. T. S. Laidley, of the Ordnance Bureau; Commander L. A. Beardslee, United States Navy; David Smith, chief engineer, United States Navy; General William Sooy Smith, civilian, civil engineer; A. L. Holley, civilian, civil engineer; R. H. Thurston, civilian, civil engineer.

Under this act the board took the place of the Ordnance Office in the construction of this machine and the testing of materials. Some additions to the machine were required by the board, which increased its weight, and it was agreed that $6,500 therefor should be added to the original contract price. The evidence presented to the committee shows that in the progress of the work of constructing a machine of the strength and delicacy required unforeseen difficulties arose, to overcome which new designs and experiments were required, but the work was unremittingly prosecuted until February 8, 1879, when the machine was completed and accepted by the board.

Colonel Laidley, president of the board above alluded to, says in regard to the construction of the machine, in a letter addressed to the President of the United States, dated February 10, 1879, two days after the machine had been accepted by the board:

"In the plans designed by Mr. Emery he adopted new principles, in the working out of which he met, as is always the case under such circumstances, with great and unlooked-for difficulty. In overcoming these difficulties Mr. Emery has spent more money than he has received for the entire machine, to say nothing of his other expenses, time, labor, &c. He has, throughout, in the performance of his part of the contract, shown a greater desire to make the machine perfect in all its details than to complete the work and obtain his money. The result of this unusual devotion is that the United States has, at this time, a more perfect machine than was called for by the terms of the contract."

The evidence before your committee further shows that this machine, as finally completed, after six years of the application of incessant labor, and that rare inventive skill without which such a machine would be impossible, is a piece of mechanism so complete in design and perfect in its construction as not only to give entire satisfaction in its operation, but to elicit the highest commendation from the board under whose direction it was put into operation and from engineers and engineering societies everywhere.

Colonel Laidley, in a report to the President, says:

"This machine combines the qualities of power and delicacy to an extent hitherto unknown, and is equally adapted to the testing of the ultimate strength of an iron bar 30 feet in length and 5 inches in diameter, and of a piece of wire of the finest size drawn, 1 inch long, and is capable of giving the exact strain of rupture of each. This is more than can be said of any other machine now in existence; in fact, its capabilities and the ease with which the greatest strains are applied are such as to pass even the bounds of belief of those who have not witnessed its operation."

Mr. E. D. Leavitt, C. E., president of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and member of other scientific associations, says, in referring to this machine:

"I freely acknowledge that I have learned more about structural materials through the tests made at Watertown during the last two years than in twenty-five years' previous experience."

Mr. A. L. Holley, C. E., a member of the board, and the distinguished steel engineer, in a paper read before the Institute of Mining Engineers, at Baltimore, 1879, says:

"The excellence of the machine, in every respect, is more than satisfactory, and its accuracy is at first sight astonishing.

* * * * * * *

"The movements of the weighing apparatus are absolutely without friction. The proof experiments were numerous, and the effects of recoil, after sudden ruptures at maximum loads, were watched with great care, but without much anxiety, because the weighing parts affected are by no means delicate in structure, and their motion is almost infinitely small. Among the tests were the following: A forged link of hard wrought iron, 5 inches in diameter between the eyes, was slowly strained in tension, and broke off short, with a loud report, at 723,000 pounds. The diameter before breaking at the point of fracture was 5.04 inches; after breaking, 4.98 inches. In order to see if the weighing parts had been disturbed by the recoil, which was obviously near the greatest recoil the machinery will ever suffer, a horse-hair was next tested. It was $\frac{7}{1000}$ of an inch in diameter; it stretched 30 per cent., and broke at one pound. One pound, in moving the indicator $\frac{1}{100}$ of an inch moves the platform against which the load presses $\frac{1}{72000000}$ of an inch.

"One word for Mr. Albert H. Emery: to his engineering talent, mechanical culture, and painstaking fidelity, to the patient devotion of all his energy, and, more than all, his money, we are indebted for a marvel of invention, of development, of workmanship, of efficiency."

A committee appointed by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences awarded to Mr. Emery the grand medal of honor offered by the Massachusetts Mechanic Association, for the invention "most conducive to human welfare," for this machine.

Your committee finds from a careful examination of accounts and vouchers presented to it that the claimant actually paid out (which money he had to borrow for the purpose, and on which he has since been paying interest) over and above the sum paid him by the Government, not counting interest or his own time or services for five years, and after deducting the value of material on hand after the construction of the machine, $38,161.62.

Your committee also finds that by a provision contained in the sundry civil bill, approved June 20, 1878, this machine was opened to the use of every body on conditions which deprived the claimant in a large measure, if not entirely, of the use and benefit of his patents, inventions, and designs used in this machine, the principal patents having been taken out prior to the date of the first contract with the Ordnance Department.

The provision referred to in the sundry civil bill is as follows:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause the machine built for testing iron and steel to be set up and applied to the testing of iron and steel for all persons who may desire to use it, upon the payment of a suitable fee for each test; the table of fees to be approved by the Secretary of War, and to be so adjusted from time to time as to defray the actual costs of the tests as near as may be; and, in order to make the final payment on contract for the construction of this machine the sum of $6,299.48 of the unexpended balance now remaining on the books of the Treasury of the appropriation for this purpose is hereby reappropriated and made available therefor."

The conclusion of a majority of your committee therefore is that the claimant is at least entitled to be reimbursed in the sum actually paid out by him for and in the construction of the machine, to wit, $38,161.62, and a reasonable sum for valuable services, to wit, $25,000, and as compensation for opening the machine to public use, to wit, $36,838.38, which, altogether, your committee places at $100,000.

Favorable reports were made by the Committee on Claims in the House in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses, recommending the allowance of $200,000, and a bill passed the Senate of the Forty-seventh Congress allowing $225,000, but your committee reduces the sum to $100,000, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. Dowd, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following views of the minority:

The claimant contracted to construct for the Government a testing machine of a given capacity at a fixed price, to wit, $25,000. As the work progressed he found he could make a much more valuable machine by an additional outlay. Without obtaining any assurance from the Government that the additional expense would be assumed and the additional labor paid for, he proceeded to change the original design and construct a much more expensive and valuable machine.

There is some difference of opinion among those who have critically examined the testimony on this point as to whether the representatives of the Government even assented to or approved, in advance, the changes and modifications above referred to.

In constructing the machine so modified and improved the contractor made divers patterns, and, by experimenting, discovered sundry devices and inventions of great value, for which he took out patents in his own name, which would be indispensable in building other like machines, should others be wanted by the Government in other parts of the country. The Government has paid to Mr. Emery, in addition to the contract price, and on account of the additional cost and value of the machine, $6,500, and it was proposed in this committee to recommend the payment to the contractor of all his outlays for expenses, and reasonable compensation for his services in perfecting the machine and invention, and taking out the patents, if he would assign these patents to the Government. This he declined to do, alleging that he had already assigned them to a company in which he himself was largely interested. Mr. Emery admits that as the Government has paid all and more than it contracted to pay, his claim does not rest upon any legal right, and the undersigned failed to perceive any basis for it in "equity and good conscience."

The minutes of the committee on the 25th of February, 1884, when this report was agreed to, show as follows, namely:

"Mr. Ray, of New York, moved that the report of the subcommittee on the House bill 132, for the relief of Albert H. Emery, be amended by striking out the amount $100,000 and inserting instead $200,000.

"Mr. BROWN moved to amend the motion offered by Mr. Ray, of New York, by striking out the amount $200,000 and inserting instead $67,000; which motion was rejected by a vote of 6 yeas and 8 nays.

"The amendment offered by Mr. Ray, of New York, was rejected.

"Mr. WARNER moved to strike out the amount $100,000, in the report of the subcommittee, and insert instead $87,000; which was rejected by a vote of 7 yeas and 8 nays.

"The report of the subcommittee was then adopted."

It thus appears that very grave doubt existed in the minds of the Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress as to the propriety of allowing this claim for only $100,000, just one-half of the amount donated by the Senate bill 929. This amount they arrived at after a very careful investigation and accurate calculation.

They arrive at the sum of $100,000, as follows:

To reimburse the sum actually paid out by Emery for and in the construction of the machine, over and above the amount of $31,500 already paid him by the Government	$38,161 62
Add a sum for services during construction, &c., at $5,000 per annum	25,000 00
Compensation for opening machine to public use, to wit	36,838 38
Total	100,000 00
Now add to this the sum already paid to Emery, to wit	31,500 00
And we have the sum of	131,500 00

to be paid by the Government for a machine which was to be constructed originally for the sum of $25,000, and for which the additional sum of $5,600 was agreed to be paid.

The undersigned are not only disposed to be just, but generous, with this claimant. He has invented and constructed a most useful and valuable machine, and at a cost which clearly exceeded his original estimate. We are willing that he should be paid the amount expended by him over and above the sum he has heretofore received ($31,500), to wit, the sum of $38,161.62, which amount includes some interest, and also a reasonable sum for his services, say $5,000 per annum—$25,000—making the total sum now to be paid him $63,161.62. When we add to this the sum he has already received, to wit, $31,500, the total cost of the machine will be $94,661.62.

The people, whose money purchased this machine, surely ought to be allowed to use the same under the existing law, and this is certainly no infringement of the rights of the claimant. We can not, therefore, concur with the majority of the Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress in recommending that the sum of $36,838.38 be paid to Mr. Emery, because the people are permitted the free use of their own machine.

For these reasons the undersigned recommend that the said Senate bill 929 be amended by striking out the words "two hundred thousand dollars" and inserting the words "sixty-three thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars and sixty-two cents." And with this amendment we recommend that said bill do pass.

CONNALLY F. TRIGG.
J. R. NEAL.
W. M. SPRINGER.
W. H. SOWDEN.

Mr. TRIGG and Mr. MCKENNA both rose.

Mr. TRIGG. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MCKENNA. I believe, Mr. Chairman, I am entitled to recognition, but I will give way to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG] if he desires.

Mr. TRIGG. I wish to move the amendment recommended by the minority of the committee, which is, to strike out in line 11 the words "two hundred thousand dollars" and insert the words "sixty-three thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars and sixty-two cents." I will state to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] that I am willing this bill should pass with that amendment.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Chairman, the report which has been read renders it unnecessary to make a very detailed statement of the merits of this claim. The machine in question is a very valuable one, as is indicated by the opinions of experts set forth in the report of the committee. The machine is designed to test the strength of structural materials. It is now in operation at the Watertown arsenal. It is a machine of most remarkable power, and also of great delicacy, as indicated by what it will do. On the occasion of its trial a forged link of hard wrought iron, 5 inches in diameter between the eyes, was slowly strained in tension, and broke short off with a loud report at 723,000 pounds. In order to ascertain if the weighing parts had been disturbed by the recoil, which was obviously near the greatest recoil the machine will ever suffer, a horse-hair was next tested. It was only $\frac{7}{1000}$ of an inch in diameter; it was stretched 30 per cent., and broke at 1 pound.

The machine tests the strength of almost any material, and also the strength of the most fragile structures, such as eggs and nuts. It is not recommended, however, as a nut-cracker; the size of the machine militates against that. But its combined strength and delicacy show that the opinions of experts contained in the report are not exaggerations of the value of the machine. It is considered one of the greatest and best, if not the greatest and best, contributions to the mechanical inventions of the age, having secured to its inventor the gold medal of honor of the Massachusetts Mechanical Charitable Association as the single exhibit calculated to promote the general welfare of mankind.

It is hardly necessary, Mr. Chairman, to go into further detail of the merits of this instrument. The minority report concedes its merit—concedes that the inventor is entitled to compensation for his outlay, and some reward for the brain work and time required to perfect this invention. The only disagreement is as to the amount which Congress should award. This is a matter which has been recommended by Presidents, by Secretaries of War, by committees of both Houses of Congress, by the action of the Senate of the United States; in fact, it stands here recommended by the opinion of every one who has paid the slightest attention to it. With these remarks I would be willing, so far as I am concerned, to submit this bill to the consideration of the House. I reserve, however, the remainder of my time, ten minutes of which I have agreed to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I will reserve those ten minutes until the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG] has spoken.

Mr. HERMANN. Before the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] takes his seat I desire to ask him how much, according to his investigations, this inventor has actually expended of his own means upon this invention more than he has received from the Government.

Mr. MCKENNA. He has received from the Government under appropriations which have been made about $31,000. He has expended $129,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Of his own money?

Mr. MCKENNA. Of his own money.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Besides his time.

Mr. MCKENNA. He has expended both time and money. He has incurred an indebtedness of over $200,000, so that the monthly interest upon that indebtedness amounts to $1,000.

This instrument, so far as his invention was concerned, was a comparatively new one; the principles were difficult in their application; some of the forgings which were made proved insufficient, and new forgings had to be made. The machine, I believe, contains screws 38 feet long and 8 inches in diameter, true to the gauge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I want to know what this man has given to the Government. Has he parted with his patents to the Government?

Mr. MCKENNA. No; the transfer of the patent is not involved in this.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. He has refused to do that.

Mr. MCKENNA. This instrument is composed of inventions which can be used independently. He proposes to concede to the Government the right which, by the way, it does not possess now, to the use of all the inventions contained in the machine.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then, the Government can thoroughly control and use the patents?

Mr. MCKENNA. No; it has not such use now. If the smallest part of this machine upon which there is a patent should break the instrument would be rendered absolutely of no worth to the Government.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then, are we paying this man for one machine?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; that is what is asked.

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, sir; one machine; and it is worth the price proposed to be paid.

Mr. HERMANN. I do not understand it to be the fact that the Government is paying him for only one machine.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I want to know what rights the Government gets—whether we are simply paying for this machine, or for the patents, or for the use of the patents. Will the Government be able to reconstruct this machine or parts of it, or to make other machines as it may need them? I want this matter clearly explained.

Mr. MCKENNA. So far as concerns the use by the Government of the patents that go to make this machine, the Government will have the use of them; it will have the right to reconstruct this machine for its own use; but it will have no right to dispose of the patents to other persons.

Mr. FINDLAY. What use have private parties of this machine?

Mr. MCKENNA. Private parties have the right now to use this machine. It is at work every day. Work is waiting to be tested by it.

Mr. HERMANN. Was not the right to the use of this machine absolutely taken by act of Congress and given to the public upon the payment of a certain small fee?

Mr. MCKENNA. I answer, yes.

Mr. HERMANN. In other words, has there not been virtually a confiscation of this man's invention?

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is what it is.

Mr. MCKENNA. As to "confiscation," I can not speak; but as to the passage of an act of Congress assuming control of the machine, and giving its use to the public, that is the fact.

Mr. CUTCHEON. How long since the invention has been thrown open to the public?

A MEMBER. Since 1878.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to know whether, when the Government contracted for the construction of that machine, it did not get the right to use it as it pleased?

Mr. MCKENNA. No, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman point out any restriction contained either in the specifications or the contract under which it was built that restrained the Government in this respect?

Mr. MCKENNA. Well, I do not know that I can——

Mr. MCMILLIN. No such restriction exists.

Mr. MCKENNA. And I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. MCMILLIN. To talk about "confiscation" is a misapplication of terms.

Mr. MCKENNA. All that the Government desired to do when it advertised for this machine was to get an idea upon which the machine could be built—a machine which could be useful in the work of the Government.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But it contracted to have a machine.

Mr. MCKENNA. Well, it got a machine; and it has it to-day; but if you do not pass this bill, and if any part of the machine covered by this man's patent should break, the Government will not have a machine.

A MEMBER. Why not?

Mr. MCKENNA. Because of the patents on the various parts of the machine which are necessary to its successful operation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Can not the Government reconstruct the entire machine if it chooses?

Mr. MCKENNA. No, sir; no more than you can do the same thing with a sewing-machine.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The cases are very different.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask the gentleman from California to state whether it is not the fact that Mr. Emery himself says he has parted with these patents to other parties, and can not insure the Government against legal difficulties which may occur?

Mr. MCKENNA. As to that, I do not know.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I have heard him say so himself in committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In committee he was asked whether he would surrender his patents, and he said no, he could not do so.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman from California, as I understand, states that this inventor put into this machine $129,000, or thereabouts, of his own means.

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman what evidence he has of that fact; whether he himself or his committee examined the vouchers of expenditures incurred in the construction of the machine.

Mr. MCKENNA. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The committee in the last Congress did.

Mr. MCKENNA. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LONG. I wish to read, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio, what is stated in the report of the Forty-sixth Congress:

> It further appears from the documents on file that in order to produce such a machine as the Government and the board required, many parts, though constructed with great care, had to be made over and over again; and without entering into details as to changes, enlargements, new inventions, and devices that were made and used to perfect the machine, it is sufficient to say that the proofs show the actual cost of the machine to have been upwards of $129,000, for which he has received $31,500, exclusive of interest. These proofs as to cost and other details were submitted to Colonel Laidley, president of the board, and carefully examined by him and will be found in detail in Executive Document No. 74, above cited.

Mr. MCKENNA. Let me ask now much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. TRIGG. It will be noticed, Mr. Chairman, by the minority report, an amendment has been suggested striking out the sum proposed by the majority of the committee, and inserting in lieu thereof the sum of $63,000. It is proper for me to state, in behalf of the minority of the committee, they deem that sum not only a just compensation to this complainant, but a generous one under all circumstances. I do not think it is worth while to consume much time on this matter; and in fact if the House had paid attention to the reading of the report, as it fully sets forth all the facts involved, no further explanation would be needed.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman let me inquire what is the amendment he has suggested?

Mr. TRIGG. The insertion of $63,000 in place of the sum named in the bill of the majority.

Briefly, Mr. Chairman, the facts are these: The Government wished such a machine as has been constructed by Mr. Emery, and for that purpose made a contract with him for its construction. There is no complaint whatever about the machine that it is not perfect. There is no division in the committee whatever on that question. The minority agreed with the majority of the committee in saying that the Government has obtained all it contracted for, and the machine is fully up to all the requirements of the contract made with Mr. Emery for its construction.

The contract was on the part of the Government with Mr. Emery that he should construct such a machine as this at a price of $25,000.

Subsequently, after he had men at work to build the machine, he brought to the notice of Congress, or of the officials in charge of the work, that a different kind of material was needed from that which he thought would be required under the computation of $25,000. In consideration of the fact that additional and different material was required, he had, in addition to the contract price for the construction of this perfect machine, allowed to him the sum of $6,500. This $6,500 which was allowed him was absolutely over and above the price agreed to be paid by the Government. Instead of $25,000, the sum provided in the contract, Mr. Emery in fact received the sum of $31,500.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would seem, ordinarily, the matter should end there, but here we find Mr. Emery before Congress for several sessions, notably at the last session of Congress, when a bill was to be in the Senate, which, as this minority express it, donated to Mr. Emery the sum of $200,000 in addition to the price already paid him under this contract with the Government for this perfect machine. The minority report asks the majority to state upon what basis this sum of $200,000 is made out.

I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA], who wrote that majority report, to state now to this House upon what he bases his calculation of $200,000 in this case. Where does that $200,000 come from, as it is not the price for constructing the machine? The vouchers for that purpose have all been filed. Mr. Emery, it seems, comes forward with a claim in addition to the $31,500 he has already received—that in addition to that sum he has absolutely expended in constructing this machine, how much—$200,000? By no means.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will it disturb the gentleman to let me ask him a question?

Mr. TRIGG. No, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman state whether or not there were any new contracts or amendments to the contract?

Mr. TRIGG. None whatever.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Is not the gentleman from Virginia aware of the fact that this commission, created by the Government, asked for modifications in the construction of this machine?

Mr. TRIGG. Yes; I understand there was something of that kind, and for that reason I am willing, as the report of the minority states, to add an additional sum to what was agreed to be paid by the Government, and which the Government has already paid. And in that connection I wish to say the Government has paid it.

Gentlemen have alluded to the Government appointing this commission. Now, who is the Government?

I have always understood that the people represented the Government, and when the Government buys with the money of the people an invention of this or any other character, it buys it for the benefit of the people.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It was paid for by the people, and it was for the use of the people that the purchase was made.

Mr. TRIGG. That has always been my understanding.

In addition to the $31,500 which Lieutenant Emery has received, he comes before Congress and files vouchers before the Committee on Claims showing an additional expenditure over and above that sum, as appears in the report, of $38,161.62. He claims that he was put to additional cost in the construction; that that machine, to perfect it in the manner required by the contract, has cost more than he thought it would. In other words, he contracted to build and complete the machine for $31,500, and we have now before the Committee on Claims his vouchers filed to show that it has not only cost what he originally estimated, but in addition to that the sum of $38,161.62, on which sum, I desire to say, interest has been computed, so that the committee have been liberal in making that calculation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What is this additional amount for that the minority recommend? For any modifications or changes in the work?

Mr. TRIGG. The $38,161.62 appears to be, from the vouchers of Lieutenant Emery, the actual or total cost of the machine over and above the $31,500 according to the terms of the original contract.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is, the changes and modifications have carried the cost beyond the original estimate to that extent—modifications and changes passed upon by the commission and General Benét.

Mr. TRIGG. Including all costs.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then the minority recognizes rights in Lieutenant Emery over and above the $31,500.

Mr. TRIGG. They do, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You do not hold him to the strict letter of the original contract.

Mr. TRIGG. No, sir.

But following that up, I wish to say that we not only did not hold him to the original contract, but we have been exceedingly liberal, in my opinion, in another respect. We propose to do not only what we believe to be just and honest, by repaying what has been actually expended by him on account of the Government as far as the vouchers have been filed, but over and above that amount to pay him at the rate of $5,000 per annum for his services since he was first engaged in building the machine, some five years. That is what I call generosity.

Mr. LYMAN. For how long a time?

Mr. TRIGG. For five years.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. TRIGG. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. Does the gentleman from Virginia deny that this gentleman expended somewhat like $129,000 to perfect the machine?

Mr. TRIGG. I do, sir; I deny the fact. That is, I wish to be understood as saying that the papers in the case as filed before the Committee on Claims show no further expenditure beyond the $31,500, excepting the sum which I have already mentioned, and which we propose to put in this bill by way of amendment.

Mr. BUCK. But the executive documents referred to show the expenditures, do they not?

Mr. TRIGG. Yes, sir; just as the committee find; and if you will refer to the report you will see that it has already been considered. So that it appears in addition to the contract price to be paid by the Government for the machine, we have now an enormous bill for moneys expended amounting to more than the original contract price. In other words, we have a sum reaching $38,600, which the committee have recommended that this Congress shall pay; and in addition to that, as they say in their report, on account of the strong appeal made to the committee on behalf of Mr. Emery, and for his long services, that they would not only be just but generous, and allow him the sum of $25,000 for his services. These two sums added make $63,141.62. Some gentlemen have proposed making it $100,000, and that upon the hypothesis that the Government did not have the right when this machine was contracted for to allow it to be used by the public, and therefore propose to add $36,858.38, making up the $100,000. They proceed upon the idea that the Government, having built the machine at the enormous price which would thus be paid for it, should have the right to throw it open to the people, and that this sum would be compensation to Mr. Emery for that invention.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What rights, if any, may I ask, were reserved under Lieutenant Emery's patent?

Mr. TRIGG. None that I know of. I have no information of any.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask a question?

Mr. TRIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. I have in my hand the report of Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts, in the Senate, on this bill, in which he says:

It further appears from the documents on file that in order to produce such a machine as the Government and the board required, many parts, though constructed with great care, had to be made over and over again; and without entering into details as to changes, enlargements, new inventions, and devices that were made and used to perfect the machine, it is sufficient to say that the proofs show the actual cost of the machine to have been upwards of $129,000, for which he has received $31,500, exclusive of interest.

Mr. TRIGG. I will say to the gentleman, frankly, that all of that appeared before the committee, and I have been unable to see, and so have the minority of the committee, upon what ground it is based; and I call now upon those gentlemen who advocate the payment of this sum of $200,000 again to state on what basis they make the claim, and, if they can, to produce the vouchers and papers which involve that expenditure.

Mr. BUCK. The proof is to be found in Executive Document No. 74, Forty-sixth Congress. All of the papers are on record.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. TRIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask him whether these vouchers were not submitted to Colonel Laidley, colonel of ordnance at the Watertown arsenal, and if he did not report that this money had been actually expended? Is not that a fact?

Mr. TRIGG. I do not know that that is a fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the fact.

Mr. TRIGG. I will say this, that it appeared conclusively to my mind when these papers were overhauled that, in addition to the sum of $31,500 expended for the machine, the absolute cost, calculating the interest on Mr. Emery's outlay of the additional sums expended by him, only amounted to $38,600.

As the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] reminds me, the Government furnished the machinery and implements and material with which to make these tests, in large measure. And when he simply acted under his contract with the Government to construct such a machine as I say he has constructed, I am not willing, for myself, to agree that the sum of $100,000 shall be paid, much less the sum of $200,000, which has been passed in the Senate. The payment of $100,000 recommended by the committee is based upon the idea that when the Government chose to construct this machine for the use of the people they had not the right to throw it open to public use.

Mr. FARQUHAR. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. TRIGG. I yield for a question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. When the Government gave the use of this machine to what the gentleman calls the people, is it not the fact that its use was in the hands of corporations, that the corporations were the first who had the use of the machine at Watertown, and that private individuals have been set aside?

Mr. TRIGG. I am not aware of any such action as that.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is outside of the case.

Mr. FARQUHAR. When the gentleman said the Government had caused this machine to be constructed and it was the people's right to use it, I think it proper to suggest that private individuals or big corporations came there and took the use of this machine; that without building machines of their own they took the benefit of this patent. Let me say further that in the sundry civil bill of this year there is a clause for building a miniature machine of this kind for the United States Government to cost $15,000, so as to open the doors wider for private individuals and corporations to use this Emery patent.

Mr. TRIGG. I fail to see the bearing of that upon the question now before the committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In order better to understand the bearing of it, permit me to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR] whether this party sold the use of the machine to corporations and got the compensation for it?

Mr. FARQUHAR. The United States Government has given the use of this machine to corporations.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then does he receive double pay?

Mr. FARQUHAR. He does not get pay. The Government takes in the revenue.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TRIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will state that the condition on which the machine is used by private individuals is that they shall pay the actual expense of running it. The Government gets no revenue from it at all. And here it may be proper for me to state that on a careful examination of the claim when I was a member of the Claims Committee in the last Congress I was wholly unable to find a single reservation of the right or a prohibition of the exercise of the right either in the original contract or in the specifications under which the machine was built. I think gentlemen will be unable to find anything of the sort, and that when the Government bought the machine it had the right to do as it pleased with it.

Mr. TRIGG. I believe I have said about all I want to say—except this: Some gentleman has called attention to the fact that $129,000 was the price of constructing the machine instead of the figures I have given to the committee. I think if the executive document is produced it will be seen there is included in that $129,000 the sum of perhaps $10,000 a year to be paid to Mr. Emery for his services in constructing the machine. It is in that way that that sum is made up.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. While he was under contract to build the machine.

Mr. TRIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCK. I hold in my hand that executive document. The items will show the total amount of the cost of this machine was $129,000. The details are given; and there follows a schedule of the amounts paid to the Ames Manufacturing Company and the other companies that furnished the material; and it is shown that the Government paid out $38,170, including interest, for the use of the machine.

Mr. TRIGG. I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CALDWELL. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment by moving to strike out "$63,000" and insert "$129,000," the cost of this machine. If as part of that sum this $10,000 a year is included, I for one believe Mr. Emery's services to mankind are worth it, every dollar of it. You have only to contemplate one such disaster as has lately occurred in the West or anywhere else where a bridge or other structural material goes under at the cost of human life and suffering, to know that the United States Government is bound to the due and just compensation of a genius second to that of no man who has ever inscribed his name on the roll of inventors.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that this is a remarkable machine. Everybody testifies that it is absolutely perfect; it is the wonder of the world. I move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. TRIGG. I hope this does not come out of my time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Certainly not. I was recognized and have spoken in my own time.

Mr. TRIGG. I was not aware of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] for the purpose of offering an amendment to the amendment. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG] is entitled to the floor for forty minutes longer, and he has yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I will reserve my time, Mr. Chairman, and let the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] proceed now if he desires.

Mr. MCKENNA resumed the floor, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. LONG.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am not able to give what I know this House want—that is, a clear, lucid statement of the facts of this case. That will be presented, however, by a gentleman who is immediately to follow me; and in the mean time I think we may take one or two things for granted. I think we may take for granted that there is something of merit in a claim which has three times passed the Senate after careful consideration, once at $225,000 and twice at $200,000, and which, in the Forty-sixth Congress, was presented to the House on the report of a committee at $200,000. Everybody knows who knows anything about the matter that this is an invention of immense value; that the Government would not part with this machine for anything like the sum of $200,000; that if the machine were in the hands of Mr. Emery to-day and he had never parted with it it would be worth to him far more than $200,000.

Everybody knows that a contract was made with him by which, for a certain specified sum, he was to prepare this machine and throw it open for public use. At that time no one could appreciate what it would cost. It cost more than was anticipated; it is of far more value than was anticipated; and the simple question before us to-day is, How much ought to be paid to Mr. Emery to compensate him for his services? If he did expend $129,000, that sum ought to be paid back to him. If he received nothing for the five years' services which he rendered, he should be paid for those five years' services. If by throwing open this machine to public use he has deprived himself of obtaining the public as a customer for the use of his machine, he should be paid for that.

There come in these three elements of compensation: First, compensate him for what he paid out, which is stated in Mr. HOAR'S report to be $129,000. Second, pay him for his services. To that everybody agrees, and even the minority of this committee agree that he should receive $25,000—$5,000 a year for five years. That makes $154,000. Third, compensate him for the loss which he has incurred from being unable to obtain the public as a customer for the use of his machine. That was estimated, even by the minority of the committee in the last Congress, at $38,000. That makes $192,000, and I suppose the other $8,000 were added, making the round sum of $200,000, because it was supposed that when one of the most eminent inventors of this country had invented and constructed for the use of the Government one of the most remarkable testing machines ever made, the wonder of the world, admired and commended by all who have inspected it, acknowledged by all scientific and practical authorities to be of inestimable value, it was worth while to pay him something for his genius. Therefore the total amount was fixed at $200,000.

Now, if that is too much, name some other amount, but do not cut this man down to the narrow sum which will simply repay to him what he expended. If the $129,000, as suggested in the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL], is to be regarded as a compromise sum upon which we can all agree, I am perfectly willing to assent to it, but I do think that we should not approach the question in the spirit of holding this man to the strict letter of his contract, when that contract was made without knowledge of future circumstances, and when, as is shown by the report, experiment after experiment and change after change was made by the inventor, and made by the authority of the board which superintended the work.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment? Is it not a fact that the Government defrayed all the expense of all those changes, and did not the Government furnish the material that was spoiled in making the experiments to perfect the machine, and did it not permit him to have the use of its machinery in making his inventions, and after that machinery was perfected did he not take out patents for it which he owns now?

Mr. LONG. And, in addition to all that, after all the Government had done, your own minority found that Mr. Emery had spent $38,000 over and above the $31,000 paid him.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, sir. That was intended as compensation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is not in the minority report of the committee in the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. LONG. Well, the fact is not disproved. Neither in that Congress nor in this has it been denied that there is some amount due to Mr. Emery over and above the $31,000 which he has received. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] says that sum is $129,000; another gentleman says that it is $38,000. The statement that there is a sum due him is made upon the authority of two successive committees, and nobody denies it. If it be the fact that he has paid out $38,000 more than he has received, let us make that up to him. Let us make up what the minority of this committee admit is due to him by way of compensation for the services, $25,000. Let us add to that what is also suggested by the minority as a reasonable compensation for losing the public as a customer for the machine, $31,000 more.

Mr. TRIGG. That is not suggested by the minority report in this Congress.

Mr. LONG. We are considerably at sea with regard to this matter. There is no doubt that this gentleman has paid out more than he has received; no doubt that something is due him as compensation for his services; no doubt something is due him also for losing the right to have the public as a customer for his machine. How much shall we give him? The minority say $63,000. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] says $129,000; the committee suggest $200,000.

I believe that we have got to compromise, and I am willing to agree to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL], that the amount be $129,000.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the claimant did not know at the time of making the contract with the Government for the construction of this machine that it was to be thrown open to public use.

Mr. LONG. I do not know whether he knew it or not. Evidently he did not know himself the value of his invention. That is the very point I want to make. I wish to appeal to the generosity of members of the House. You, the Government, the people, have enjoyed the advantage of a great machine of the value and perfection of which you had no conception. It may have been that this man supposed it was to be thrown open to the public. It is thrown open to the public; and thereby he lost the public as a customer. I am not arguing this question upon the letter of the contract, but am seeking to ascertain how much in fairness and justice we should pay this man.

Mr. SOWDEN. Does not the gentleman know that, on account of the immensity of this machine and its costliness of construction, it would be impossible to sell the patent either to private individuals or to corporations outside of the Government itself?

Mr. LONG. I do not know that. I think that corporations would be glad to pay for the use of an invention of this kind, if they could not otherwise secure it.

Mr. HOPKINS. If my friend from Massachusetts contends that the report of the majority of the committee is correct, and that Mr. Emery should be allowed $200,000, why is he willing, on behalf of Mr. Emery, to accept $129,000?

Mr. LONG. I accept it as a matter of good practical business—because it is the most we can get.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MCKENNA. I now yield twenty minutes to my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I feel an interest in this claim for the reason that I believe this great and rich Government of ours can afford to be honest, if not generous, toward the inventors of whose genius it avails itself. I have endeavored to acquaint myself with all the facts connected with this matter. I find that committees of the Senate and the House have repeatedly reported in favor of allowing the amount recommended by the majority report from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIBONE. That is $200,000?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, sir. In the Forty-sixth Congress, Mr. Bowman, of Massachusetts, the author of the famous Bowman act, made a report recommending the payment of that amount. In his report he used this language:

> It further appears from the documents on file that in order to produce such a machine as the Government and the board required many parts, though constructed with great care, had to be made over and over again; and without entering into details as to changes, enlargements, new inventions and devices that were made and used to perfect the machine, it is sufficient to say that the proofs show the actual cost of the machine to have been upward of $129,000, for which he has received $31,500, exclusive of interest. These proofs as to cost and other details were submitted to Colonel Laidley, president of the board, and carefully examined by him, and will be found in detail in Executive Document No. 74, above cited.
> This cost does not include any allowance for the value of the invention used in the machine, nor is there embraced in it anything for profits, both of which items should be considered in fixing the amount to be paid, for no one could wish the Government to use this machine, even at cost, without compensation to him for his inventions and his time, nor that he should assume the heavy expense and risk involved without a fair profit.

This matter was referred to Colonel Laidley, Colonel of Ordnance, at the Watertown arsenal, where this machine was being used, and in a report upon the subject Colonel Laidley said:

> The amount of $200,000, if now paid by Congress, would not, in the judgment of the undersigned, be excessive, or more than sufficient to pay the contractor a fair equivalent for his unusual devotion to the interests of the Government, the work performed by him, and the losses sustained during the time that he has given up his undivided energies to this undertaking.

In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, I find that General Benét, Chief of Ordnance of the War Department, has written a letter on this subject; and I submit if there is any man in the country who is competent to form an opinion as to the value of an invention such as this it is General Benét. I set up his judgment against the judgment of gentlemen on this floor who are to-day opposing this just claim. General Benét says:

> The inventor has produced a testing-machine believed to be the most reliable and perfect in the world, and reflecting the greatest credit on the inventive genius and mathematical skill of one of our citizens. No one can question the fact that in the laudable desire to do his whole duty to the country, and give it the master-piece of his designing and constructive faculty, he has seriously involved himself pecuniarily, and has not received any compensation for his very arduous labors. In the construction of this machine he has expended large sums over and above the amount paid him under the contract.
> It is a case that appeals strongly to our sympathies and to our sense of justice equitably rendered. In this view I respectfully recommend this matter to favorable consideration.

Mr. Eaton, of Connecticut, when a Senator of the United States, said, in speaking of this matter:

> In my opinion this appropriation ought to be made. This is the most extraordinary machine in this or any other land.

There is other testimony in this behalf. Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, recently a distinguished Congressman from New York, now mayor of that city, said on the floor of this House, in speaking of this machine:

> It is known to most gentlemen here that a testing-machine has been constructed and now belongs to the United States Government. This machine is at the United States arsenal in Watertown, Mass. It is, perhaps, the most remarkable exhibition of mechanical ingenuity that has been produced in our time; and the inventor, Mr. Emery, has recently received from the Machinists' Charitable Institution of Massachusetts the medal which they confer once in a long period upon the invention which is the most calculated to advance the interests of mankind. In other words, the machine in question has received the highest honor that it is possible to confer in this country at the hands of those who are competent to judge of its merits.

I may be permitted also to call attention to two or three utterances of distinguished Senators years ago in discussing this question. Senator HAWLEY said:

> I think the machine has been worth millions upon millions of dollars to this Government. It revises for us, revises for the world, the standard tables of tests of all the metals. I think this appropriation is exceedingly reasonable; it will be no profit to him. Four years ago this $200,000 was recommended by the most candid, the best qualified men to whom he could submit it.

Senator PLATT, of Connecticut, chairman of the Senate Committee on Patents, made several years ago an exhaustive speech on this subject, in which he stated that $200,000 is a pittance compared with the value that this machine has been to the Government. Senator VOORHEES, speaking upon the same question, remarked:

> I say that from the beginning to the end, from the incipiency of the history of this claim until the present moment, it swells upon the regard of every man that looks into it; it magnifies itself when it is examined; there is nothing like it to-day beneath the sun in all the civilized world, and there is no other such machine in existence. This gentleman has added one more proud triumph to the inventive genius which America has so long and so steadily displayed; and instead of caviling and carping about this amount, to my mind it is not only fair and reasonable, but it is small in comparison with the great results which are to be achieved by this invention.

Mr. Chairman, as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] suggests to me, any of the governments of Europe would gladly have paid a half a million of dollars for an invention such as this. This poor American inventor, who has spent in the service of the Government the fruit of his experience and genius, borrowing money to perfect this invention, believing that the Government would be honest and reimburse him, comes here to-day and asks that Congress shall be just to him, and pay him a fair remuneration for the work he has done. I trust that this justice will be granted him, and that the pittance which this inventor asks will not be withheld; that, in the language of Senator VOORHEES, neither carping nor caviling will mislead this Congress and cause it to do an unfair and an unjust act to a man who deserves the gratitude of every citizen of the United States.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. REED. I do not want to use time if we can have a vote.

Several MEMBERS. Go on, and use the time.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I have heard on this floor, every now and then, some remarks about the grinding nature and character of corporations. I am not absolutely sure, even by figure of speech, we can designate the United States as a corporation. But whether it is or not, according to my experience, it surpasses in its grinding character in a matter of this kind any corporation I have heard described on this floor.

My interest in this case—and I confess I have considerable—arises from the fact that I have witnessed myself some of the work of the wonderful machine which the United States now has, and which it is now asked to pay for.

If this were a mere case of contract to build a machine, the nature and limitations of which contract were well understood on both sides, there would be no reason on earth why the loss should not rest where it fell. But here is a contract to build a machine the like of which never existed on the face of the earth. That machine has been built by the inventor without the slightest regard to the terms of the contract, and without the slightest attempt to get his money on mere perfunctory performance of the letter of his contract. On the contrary, from the very first he has steadily held in mind the duty to produce the best machine which could be produced for the purpose for which it was designed. And whoever sees that machine in operation comes away from it with wonder and amazement. He can see it measure the strength of a single hair, and at the same time tear apart and measure every pound of resistance of an immense bridge member, a large bar of steel.

The result of the use of that machine is, that it has revolutionized the knowledge possessed by the world of the strength of materials. Heretofore we could only take a small piece and judge by that as to a large piece. Here a great piece, bridge members, can be tested in all their parts, and the result is, as has been repeatedly stated, a revolution in our knowledge on this subject.

Now, that information we have gained from that machine is worth a hundred times to the people of this country even what is proposed to be given by the Senate of the United States. We contracted for a machine of a limited character. We have got a machine which is wonderfully far-reaching in its benefits. We have got more than we bargained for, ten times and a hundred times over. Should we hesitate to pay not only a fair but a just and generous remuneration?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have every disposition to treat Lieutenant Emery honestly.

Mr. REED. Mr. Emery.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But for one I want to know how much I am paying for actual expense incurred, and how much for generosity.

Mr. REED. One hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. One word more. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG] has challenged those who signed the report of the majority of the committee to state how they made up $200,000. We have had eloquent and clean cut speeches, but that challenge has not yet been met. For one I want that to be done before I am called upon to vote on this matter.

Mr. REED. The gentleman is mistaken. That has been done by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], who has produced Executive Document No. 74, page 5, where items are given which aggregate $129,000.

Mr. SOWDEN. Let that be read for the information of the House.

Mr. REED. Precisely; that can be read for the information of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I did not hear that read.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does the gentleman insist that is in excess of the amount received by him?

Mr. REED. I do not.

Now I wish to address myself to one other point. I think that the gentleman on the other side who started this discussion has permitted himself to fall into confusion in regard to one point. He wants to know who the Government of the United States is, if it is not the people of the United States. I submit to him that there is a plain distinction between the Government of the United States as a Government and the people as people. If I sell a machine to the Government of the United States, to be used for the benefit of the Government as such, it is a very different thing from selling a machine to the Government of the United States to be distributed among the people, to be used in their private business.

Now, that is precisely the wrong which has been done to Mr. Emery in this case. He has invented a machine of great value, and the Government of the United States, instead of leaving him the right to sell to bridge corporations, to great iron manufacturing firms, and to other people who would use and want the machine, has deliberately thrown open this machine to their use, so that by using Government employés at no expense, or at merely the expense of the Government employés and at the actual cost, they can obtain the very results which they would have to purchase one of these machines in order to get, with the additional advantage of having men trained in the service of the United States, to do their private work.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is not that what the Government bought it for?

Mr. REED. No, sir; but for the purpose of doing its own work.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then would not his patent protect him?

Mr. REED. There is no such thing as a patent on a great machine like that. The only patents would be on particular devices used throughout in the manufacture of the machine; and how can he call upon the Government for damages? It is not suable. It is not subject to such a suit. How can he call for a remedy at all, and where should he apply except to Congress?

The truth is that this was done right in this House, and, if I mistake not, under the suggestion of a large iron manufacturer, himself interested in getting all of this valuable knowledge.

And in addition to that it is not merely the advantage gained by these great companies, but it is an advantage which is gained every day in the year for the people of this whole country, for everybody who crosses a bridge or uses a machine; in a word, for the whole world that is interested in this great question of the strength of materials, which is at the base of construction of every kind and character.

Mr. HAMMOND. I desire to know, for information simply, whether this gentleman still retains his patents, or whether they are held by the United States?

Mr. REED. I do not know; I simply say, whether he retains his patents or not, that they are patents for particular devices which enter into the construction of the machine, or which have to be used in the construction of this very complicated mechanism.

Mr. HAMMOND. This bill, as I understand it, undertakes simply to sell to the Government this machine and the right to use these patents; to put the machine up, and to work it. Now, I want to know whether he can not reap profit under the law from other persons as soon as the Government ceases to use the machine?

Mr. REED. I do not think he can.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why?

Mr. REED. Because he is deprived of his customers.

Mr. HAMMOND. How?

Mr. REED. Because the Government throws open the machine for their use.

Mr. HAMMOND. But suppose the Government should cease to use the machine?

Mr. REED. That is a supposition the value of which the gentleman from Georgia understands. That machine will last the lifetime of this inventor.

Mr. HAMMOND. The "gentleman from Georgia" does not know anything about how long it will last, for the reason that he knows nothing of machinery at all.

Mr. REED. I believe there is just where the difficulty is in this matter. I do not believe anybody who has seen the machine and witnessed its operations would hesitate to say that it is a just and a wise thing to pay a fair and reasonable sum for the materials actually furnished and for the genius actually employed in its construction.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Maine whether as a matter of fact the Government has not, in the act approved June 20, 1872, virtually appropriated it? In other words, whether it has not practically confiscated the machine and made it open to the public upon the payment of a certain fee?

Mr. REED. That is precisely what the United States has done, and, having done that, it ought to pay for it. Now, I want to appeal to the House to its sense of fairness. I do not know the man. I never knew him until after I had seen his machine; but it impressed me as being a great work. It impressed me as conferring a tremendous boon upon mankind. It impressed me as being of incalculable value to the people of this country. Let me say to you that you have not only taken $129,000 of this man's property, more or less, whatever the figures may show, but you have kept him dancing attendance upon the Congress of the United States until, if he be made up as ordinary men are constituted, he must be pretty nearly heart-sick by this time. All of these questions argued here in opposition seem to me to turn upon simple and trivial technicalities that do not seem to rise to the dignity of the situation in which Congress actually finds itself. Here is a great benefit conferred; here is wonderful skill displayed which has been utilized for the benefit of the Government and of the people.

A man has spent the best years of his life upon this invention and has spent more of the best years of his life in trying to hunt for the recompense of reward. He has borrowed money and is to-day weighed down and oppressed by the indebtedness which his own faithfulness to his own idea has put upon him. And the question before the Congress of the United States is, Shall we treat this in a large, fair, open, and generous manner commensurate with the favor which has been bestowed upon us or shall we measure it by some little measure which will condemn this man to the mere contract price which he has received for an article which he has furnished infinitely superior to what the contract required?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TRIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. MCKENNA. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time.

Mr. MCKENNA. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds I desire to yield a few moments to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The sole difficulty in this case is that this applicant for this money has desired to eat the cherry and keep it too. He built a machine for the Government of the United States, and there never was an hour when the Government of the United States was not willing to pay him not only what it agreed to pay him, but all that he expended in excess and a reasonable compensation for his time. The Government agreed with him that he should build a machine for $25,000. In the construction of that machine there is not a particle of evidence that any one in authority ever authorized the expenditure of a dollar above that amount. That is what the testimony shows. And yet the machine having been built, and having been a success, every report of every committee that has investigated the claim, whether a majority or a minority report, has shown a willingness to reimburse this man for all he has expended. That is more than a private individual would do, and yet the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has belittled the Government of the United States because it would not yield to all the demands this man has succeeded in inventing.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania not admit the expenditure of $129,000?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I admit no such thing. I say there are nearly $50,000 of interest included in that, and an item of $21,000 for salary, for services when he was building under a contract.

The Government of the United States contracted for the building of this machine, and when it was built it was entitled to make what use of it it pleased. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] assumed that the Government of the United States having paid for the machine had not the right to hire out its use. I say it had a right to hire it out to every man in the Republic.

The applicant in this case, when he was asked the question whether he would assign to the United States the patents that he secured while he was constructing this machine and during the time he claims pay, said to the committee that under no circumstances would he assign them now if he had them in his possession; and then it leaked out that he had already assigned them and they were in the hands of a company of which he was a member; and he is to-day receiving, as I am informed, the benefits growing out of the patents which he refused to assign to the Government, but for which it is assumed we should pay him.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] will permit me, I will suggest another fact in that connection. I asked

Emery whether, if the Government would pay him $200,000, he would assign his patents so that the Government could manufacture other machines to use at other foundries and arsenals of the Government, and he said no he would not and could not.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I remember that very well. The minority of the committee in the Forty-eighth Congress were willing to reimburse the man for all he had expended and pay him a reasonable compensation for his time. He has no rights here whatever beyond that. All in excess that Congress gives him is a gratuity. He will have by the minority report all the Government agreed to pay him and more too. If you want to pension this man for doing a great service to the country bring in your pension bill. The difficulty has been this question has always been before Congress under false pretenses—a pretense that the Government had this man's patents.

Mr. BAYNE. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask if the patents under which this machine is manufactured belong to a company whether the right to supply the various devices for such machines would not also belong to that company?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes; and of that company he is a member.

Mr. BAYNE. Does not this bill provide as follows:

Said machine, together with the full right to the use therein of all patents and inventions used in its design and construction, shall belong to the United States?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But that is the specific machine itself which he manufactured under contract. That provision does not extend beyond that machine, which he made while he was in the employ of the Government of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TRIGG. I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania five minutes more.

Mr. HERMANN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. HERMANN. I wish to ask him whether or not under this section of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1878—

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause the machine built for testing iron and steel to be set up and applied to the testing of iron and steel for all persons who may desire to use it, upon the payment of a suitable fee for each test—

Whether or not under that language his rights to a patent for the product of his inventive genius so far as this machine is concerned are not absolutely worthless?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. There is the milk in the cocoanut. That is what is the matter with this man Emery. The Government of the United States proposes to utilize the machine it has paid for, and that infringes upon the patents which he obtained while he was in the employ of the Government, and for which time he now seeks pay.

Mr. GALLINGER. A moment ago you said that those patents were still in his possession and available for his benefit. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I say they are still in his possession or his assignees.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then you must take back what you said awhile ago.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I take nothing back. I say that he has patents which have been assigned to a company of which he is a member, and he has a right to all the fruits of them except so far as they come in competition with this machine of the Government, for which the Government paid all it agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has not the Government legislated him out of his rights by its enactment in regard to that machine?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It has legislated on nothing new. It had, before the legislation, all the rights it got by the legislation by the terms of the contract under which it was built. [Several MEMBERS. No, no.] It built the machine and paid for it, and had a right to use it. These patents were issued subsequent to his contract with the Government and must, both in law and equity, remain forever subject to whatever rights the Government acquired thereby.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is not a fact that Mr. Emery consented that that clause should be put in the bill giving the Government that right?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not know as to that.

Mr. PERKINS. I am told that he did, when the appropriation was made.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] a question. I understood him to assert awhile ago that this claimant has always appeared before Congress under false pretenses. I ask the gentleman whether, in the last Congress, he, as a member of the Committee on Claims, did not recommend the payment of $67,000 to this man, who, he says, has always been here under false pretenses?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir. [Laughter.] If the gentleman had listened to what I have already said he would not have asked me that question. I said in the beginning that the minority of the committee were always in favor of giving this man something—all he could prove to be his due, and more. But his claim was so much in excess of what he was entitled to, and that excess was so entirely without any sort of right or equity, that his demands could not be acceded to. The amount beyond what we were, in the Forty-eighth Congress, willing to give was, I repeat, based upon the false assumption that the Government was using the gentleman's patents, when in fact he has assigned them to a company of which he is a member. False pretenses may be a harsh term, but I mean no more by it than to say that the facts in the case are not what was assumed. The claim was several weeks before the Committee on Claims in the Forty-eighth Congress before it was known that he was seeking pay for inventions which he was keeping for his own use and benefit.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman to tell us also by what process of figuring he arrived at the sum of $67,000, which he was willing to allow in the last Congress.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Sixty-three thousand dollars was the maximum amount that I could obtain evidence of his having expended in addition to a reasonable compensation. The sixty-seven thousand which I assented to was a compromise, and a sum which, in my opinion, gave the man the benefit of every doubt. There was no especial process of figuring. It was a lumping sum, and near four thousand more than he could prove to be his due.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TRIGG. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROWN]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I have nothing more to say, Mr. Chairman. I reserve my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] to yield for a motion that the committee rise. It is evident that we can not finish the consideration of this bill to-day. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for that motion?

Mr. MCKENNA. I have not risen to detain the House. I appreciate its impatience and am very desirious to reach a vote. I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG] whether he will not agree to submit the matter now to a vote upon a motion which I will make to lay the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. TRIGG. No, sir; I will not. This side desires to be heard further.

Mr. MCKENNA and Mr. LONG. How much time do you want?

Mr. TRIGG. We want all we can get.

Mr. MCKENNA. I did not understand that the gentleman had approached the bill with any such spirit as that. I therefore move that this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are two amendments pending.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us vote on those amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suppose the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] will not attempt to force this debate to a close when almost all the time on his side has been occupied, while the time belonging to this side has not been.

Mr. TRIGG. I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] will withdraw the motion he has made.

Mr. MCKENNA. I have no desire to be unfair or to prevent any proper discussion. I do not, however, want the whole time consumed and discussion employed for that purpose.

Mr. TRIGG. I can assure the gentleman that all we want on this side is to be fairly heard.

Mr. MCKENNA. I reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-five minutes of the hour of the gentleman from California have been occupied, and thirty-five minutes of the hour of the gentleman from Virginia. The ten minutes allotted by the gentleman from Virginia to the gentleman from Illinois have not been consumed. Those ten minutes, if occupied, would make the time exactly equal between the two sides.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentlemen on the other side whether they would not consent, in view of the lateness of the hour, that the Committee of the Whole adopt the recommendation of the minority of the committee and report it to the House.

Mr. TRIGG. I should have no objection to that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object, and ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit as a substitute for the pending bill the proposition which I send to the desk.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw the objection which I made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL. I simply withdrew the objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that two amendments are pending.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my proposition is a substitute for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That could only be in order after a vote had been taken on the amendments designed to perfect the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The substitute can be offered now, though the vote upon it must be deferred.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear read the substitute which which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] offers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof:

That there be referred to the Court of Claims, to be considered under the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," the claim of Albert H. Emery, of Stamford, Conn., against the United States on account of the cost of and the time spent by him, and for the use of all patents and inventions in designing and constructing the testing machine built for him by the United States, as alleged by him; and that report be made thereon to Congress, as required in said act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the amendment sent up, which is in the nature of a substitute for the bill, is not in order until the vote has been taken on the two pending amendments designed to perfect the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course I understand that the vote must first be taken on the two pending propositions, but I wishto say a word on this substitute.

It must be very manifest to those who have listened to this debate that the principal trouble here is to ascertain the facts. I submit that with the facts ascertained there will be no trouble in doing this gentleman justice; and without the facts we are blindfold, and must act in the dark.

Mr. TRIGG. I understood that the time to which I was entitled had not expired. I desire to be heard further on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists upon it he is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. TRIGG. I do insist on it, unless it is understood that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine that we accept the minority report shall be agreed to. If that is understood I am perfectly willing to yield the floor to allow that arrangement to be carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not withdrawn his amendment, and the vote must first be taken on that amendment.

Mr. TRIGG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that if the Committee of the Whole should vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, the next vote in order will be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, this matter was presented in the Forty-eighth Congress, and I have made strenuous efforts to arrive at the facts of the case. During the investigation which went on in the committee it was demonstrated that while Mr. Emery was engaged in building a machine which is now the subject of controversy he perfected other patents which went into the construction of this machine, as well as other inventions which were never used in the construction of the machine, but upon which he obtained patents.

He came before that Congress when his case was presented, as he had come before prior Congresses, asking to be paid $225,000 out of the Treasury. I believe the Senate passed a bill granting him that amount. The Senate then passed his claim for $200,000. That came to this House, and an effort was made to pass it, but it was defeated. It was discussed in the House, and it was defeated.

But here we are furnished with the claim again, and the question is, what shall we do with it? Now there has been a great deal of talk about what we should pay. I undertake to say, in response to the executive document which has been so industriously quoted in this debate, and the remarks of gentlemen which have been based upon it, and upon which an attempt has been made to found a contract, that there is not a man in the world who can figure out $129,000, or even $100,000 of money expended by Mr. Emery in the construction of that machine, so far as the facts stated in that report are concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. Less $31,500.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Every dollar has been included and spent in the way of salary of employés and everything else, going to make up an enormous expense. It includes even the price of pencils used in making the drawings for these patents.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when Mr. Emery came before us to present his claim for a report by the committee every effort was made to find out how much was due him. We were not able to figure up anything like the amount suggested by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] and the other gentlemen who have talked on this subject.

When the minority report here has been adopted you have done what? You will have paid him in salary the full amount he undertook to furnish the machine to the Government originally. I can not reiterate that too much. If you give him $25,000 you will pay him as much as he agreed to take for the whole machine.

Mr. TILLMAN. Work and all.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; work and all—material, time, and everything. And the question is whether this House is ready to do it; that is, to pay him so much more than he agreed to receive. If the exaggerated imaginations of gentlemen which prevail here, and if this magnificent generosity on other people's money prevail here and $200,000 is given to him, you will then give him more than four times, ay, more than five times more of profit than the machine was to cost. Now, is the House ready for it? I am ready to do what is fair. I would not accept the service of the humble slave without compensation. I would not take any man's material without compensation. But, sir, at the same time when a man agrees to make a machine at a certain price I see no obligation the Government is under to give him four or five times that price or profit.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Did this man propose to furnish to the Government as perfect and as good a machine as the Government now has for $25,000?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; he did. He undertook to furnish to the Government a perfect machine.

Gentlemen talk about the loss which he sustained. It is said the material for which he paid was thrown away. Why? Because in his own mind it did not exist at the time—the perfect machine we now have—and it was in a great degree a work of experiment.

Mr. MCKENNA. Are you not willing to allow him something?

Mr. MCMILLIN. When he came before the committee I agreed, if I could get at the amount, unhesitatingly to pay for what he lost in the way of materials.

Mr. MCKENNA. Can not you estimate it now?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am very candid in saying, in response to that inquiry, that I have more difficulty in that proposition than in any that has come before this Congress. I do not see how the facts can be reconciled, for after an examination in the committee, after examining the vouchers of Mr. Emery and hearing his statement, I do not know what is due him, and I see no way on which an agreement can be reached. One gentleman suggests that he be paid $200,000, another $100,000; some think $129,000 should be paid, and yet another suggests sixty-odd thousand dollars. I see no way, therefore, of reconciling the differences of opinion which exist in regard to the amount due him except by the reference as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HERMANN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERMANN. The gentleman remarks that the claimant agreed to construct the machine in every sense perfect for $25,000. Now, I will ask the gentleman whether subsequently, under a special act of Congress, and by authority and consent of a board of engineers appointed by the President of the United States, this machine was not so modified as to require great and expensive additions?

Mr. MCMILLIN. It was ascertained that some of the material should be of a heavier mold than that which the contractor originally proposed, and thereupon an additional expenditure of $6,500 was made at Mr. Emery's instance, which was paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. You admit that in your judgment something is due, but that the trouble is, how much. I want to inquire if General Benét's judgment is not worth just as much as your judgment or mine?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have examined General Benét's statement, and I think so much of it that I would not regard it as having any weight in the matter, with all due deference to him, and I do not wish to be understood in any manner as questioning his integrity in making that statement, but simply that I would not take his statement in preference to the facts.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is unfortunate for General Benét. He does not evidently understand his business, according to the gentleman's opinion. You ought to get him dismissed.

But another matter: Is it not true that this man borrowed money, believing that the Government would repay him, and that he paid interest upon it, and yet you refuse to reimburse him?

Mr. MCMILLIN. If you adopt the minority report you not only pay him with interest, but you pay more than 6 per cent., more than 8 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then the gentleman's mathematics are different from mine, for we do not agree on that point.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Our mathematics may be different, but I think the gentleman will admit on examination that my calculation is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. And further let me say to the gentleman that he does not agree with the mathematics of this Executive Document, which has been examined by Colonel Laidley, and approved by him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We asked Mr. Emery when he came before the committee if he was ready to turn over the patents. He said he was not; and I wish to do him the justice to state that he said he had organized a company, of which he was a member, and that the patents were in the hands of that company. So that those gentlemen who undertake to burden the Government with the payment of $200,000 on account of this claim, by saying that if any part of the machinery is broken it can not be supplied, will be confronted by the same difficulty when the bill for $200,000 passes, if it does pass.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TRIGG. I now take the floor, and yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] for ten minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to withdraw his amendment, and I yield to him for a moment.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am satisfied that if I insist upon my amendment there will be no action taken, and rather than have this case to fail now—and I wish to say that I have no interest in it whatever; I do not know this man from the veriest stranger on the face of the earth—I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the best course for the House to take is, in my judgment, to adopt the substitute recommended by the gentleman from Indiana. When this matter was before the committee, and when it was being considered afterward in the preparation of the minority report, I thought I had become familiar with all the facts. There were certain facts undisputed. But I now find that there is not a fact from one end to the other that is not disputed, and we have lost nearly one day of the valuable time of the people in trying to obtain some understanding of the particular case before us—valuable time trying to find out the facts—and we are as much in the dark at this moment as when we began the discussion. So much confusion has prevailed with regard to these facts that the friends of the bill, who started out to-day claiming $200,000 as a proper and just remuneration to the claimant, are willing to take $63,000, which was the amount recommended by the minority of the committee.

Mr. DUNHAM. Do we not lose another day if we do not end this matter now?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we can end it now.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then let us do it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am therefore of the opinion that a case involving so many controverted facts as this case does ought to go to the Court of Claims, so that the facts may be judicially ascertained. I agreed with the minority to report $63,000 for the claimant, but I am not satisfied now that the vouchers presented to the committee on which we acted at that time were proved. There was no chance to examine any witnesses on the other side. We had but one side of the case before us, and upon that side all these reports have been made.

It is possible that this gentleman has made one of the greatest inventions of modern times. It is possible he is entitled to more than $63,000. It is possible he has rendered a great service to the Government. But those facts are disputed all along the line; and we do not know at what point to fix the amount of money to be allowed as his compensation. Let the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be passed. Let the claimant go to the Court of Claims and establish all these facts judicially, and next winter, when we come back here, we will know what to do in order to do justice to the claimant in this case.

I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TRIGG].

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "$200,000" and insert "$63,161.62."

The amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is next on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That there be referred to the Court of Claims to be considered under the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1883, entitled 'An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government,' the claim of Albert H. Emery, of Stamford, Conn., against the United States, on account of the cost of, and the time spent by him, and for the use of all patents and inventions in designing and constructing the testing machine built and erected by him for the United States, as alleged by him. And that report be made thereon to Congress, as required in said act."

The question being taken, the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 121.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point that a quorum has not voted?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the point as to a quorum.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 13, after the word "therefor," add the following:

"Which shall be in full of all claims against the Government on the part of said Emery for this invention."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California, that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the bills on which action has been taken.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration Senate bills under the special order of the House, had instructed him to report various bills with sundry recommendations.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a bill which comes over from last week.

JABEZ BURCHARD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of a bill which comes over reported from the Committee of the Whole House last Friday.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 570) for the relief of Jabez Burchard.

Mr. SPRINGER. At the time the House took a recess last Friday this bill was being considered on the question of ordering it to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there was a motion to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee reported the bill adversely. I desire to ask whether the motion to postpone indefinitely is debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know, the present occupant not being in the chair at that time, what has been done in regard to this bill. The motion to postpone indefinitely is debatable unless the previous question was ordered on it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The previous question was not ordered. The House was dividing on the question of postponing indefinitely.

I desire to explain this bill for one moment. I am satisfied that the Committee of the Whole House on last Friday misapprehended its provisions when they recommended that it be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. This bill is for the relief of Jabez Burchard, who was an engineer in the Navy.

A MEMBER. Not the New York Burchard?

Mr. SPRINGER. He does not belong to the Burchard family of New York, but is a Philadelphia gentleman. This gentleman contracted disease of the eyes while in the naval service, and on the report of a retiring board was retired on half-pay or furlough-pay. The board state in their report that there was no evidence before them at the time that the disease of his eyes was contracted in the service. He appealed from that decision, and the case was afterward inquired into by the Secretary of the Navy, who was at that time Mr. Thompson, of Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the previous question has not been ordered on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it has not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the House was dividing and that no quorum had voted.

Mr. SPRINGER (resuming). Mr. Thompson, at that time Secretary of the Navy, was of the opinion that the disease for which this man was retired was contracted in the line of duty, and recommended that he be placed upon the retired-list with 75 per cent. of sea-pay; which was done.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for the House to resume the position it was in at the adjournment when this bill was last under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The Chair is advised that the question had been put to the House, and a vote was being taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. No decision had been reached. The previous question had not been ordered.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the point of "no quorum" having been made, the roll was called, and thereafter a motion was made to adjourn, and the House adjourned.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am not speaking against time, but because I think the House did injustice to this man, and ought now to do him justice.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have the Journal examined and ascertain what the condition of the bill is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain in two minutes the point that is in the bill.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that debate is not in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I make the point of order that that objection comes too late. I was on the floor nearly five minutes when the point was made.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman was proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. Oh, no, he was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Maine [Mr. REED] never would consent to my proceeding to enlighten the House. This is a good bill and I want to explain it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds upon examination of the RECORD, that tellers had been appointed, had taken their places, and were counting the votes; that it was ascertained that a quorum was not present; that thereupon the roll was called, and that afterward the House adjourned. The Chair thinks that under these circumstances debate is not in order; and the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] had proceeded in his remarks a few moments before the point was made was owing, perhaps, to a misapprehension as to the condition of the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence on account of sickness.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the passage of joint resolution (S. R. 94) ordering the printing of the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences, with the accompanying memoirs, in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced disagreement in amendments of the House to bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and stated it had appointed Mr. SPOONER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, as conferees on its part.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m., the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. HATCH in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the special order of the House.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that members present be allowed to call up, each, a bill, alternating from one side of the House to the other, and that in each case the report be read.

Mr. TAULBEE. That will not preclude debate?

Mr. MATSON. Oh, no.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM S. BEWLEY.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4745) granting a pension to William S. Bewley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William S. Bewley, late of Company C, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Claimant enlisted December 14, 1862, and was discharged November 12, 1863.

He alleges, in declaration filed June 28, 1880, that about March or April, 1863, while recruiting for the regiment, he contracted rheumatism from exposure. Also, at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, in July, 1863, he contracted pneumonia, resulting in disease of the lungs; and about the same time and place he contracted dyspepsia.

This claim was rejected on the ground of no record of any one of the disabilities alleged, and the claimant is unable to prove by medical or other evidence based upon personal knowledge that rheumatism or dyspepsia originated in the service, or that he had disease of lungs at discharge.

William Lee, a private of claimant's company, testifies that he was with claimant while in the service; saw him nearly every day, and know that, while at Camp Nelson, Tennessee, in July or August, 1863, he was taken sick with what Surgeon Hunt called pneumonia fever, and claimant was ordered to a private house, where he was treated by said surgeon. Next saw claimant in November, 1863, when he was suffering with a pain in his side, had a bad cough, looked badly, and was suffering from dyspepsia.

John D. Carey, a private of Company A, First Regiment Tennessee Light Artillery, testifies that when claimant came to the camp, in November, 1863, he was suffering from dyspepsia, had a bad cough, and complained of rheumatism, and in March, 1864, was stricken down with said disease, and was then treated by Dr. Brown.

James M. Dean, assistant surgeon of First Tennessee Light Artillery, testifies that he saw claimant in the spring of 1864, and knows that his health was bad, and that he was then suffering from rheumatism, dyspepsia, and a bad cough, and was being treated by the surgeon.

Nelson Price, a private in first United States Heavy Artillery, testifies that while stationed at Knoxville, Tenn., claimant came to his regiment, in the spring of 1864, when he had a cough, dyspepsia, and rheumatism, and was looking very badly.

William Moore, first lieutenant of claimant's company, testifies that while at Camp Nelson, Tennessee, in July, 1863, claimant was taken sick with pneumonia fever; was taken to a private house and there treated by Surgeon Hunt. Next saw claimant when he resigned, in November, 1863, when he was suffering from a bad cough, rheumatism, and dyspepsia, and was unable for further duty.

F. Bible, captain of claimant's company, testifies that he does not remember that claimant ever was sick or that he ever was treated by the surgeon for the alleged or any other disabilities while in the service.

J. F. Hall and J. H. Hayes testify that they lived near neighbors to claimant for the first ten years after his discharge, and know that during said time he suffered from rheumatism, dyspepsia, and had a very bad cough.

Dr. William G. Logan testifies that he treated claimant at Bryantsville, Ky., in 1863, for pneumonia.

Nelson Brice testifies that claimant was suffering from rheumatism, dyspepsia, and a cough when he came home from the Army, and has continued to suffer from the same ever since.

David Rhea testifies that he saw claimant in the fall of 1863, and knew he was sick. Dr. Brown said he was suffering from rheumatism and dyspepsia, for which he then rendered treatment.

Dr. E. B. Hale testifies that he treated claimant from 1865 to 1873 for rheumatism, indigestion, and some chest trouble.

Your committee are of the opinion that the preponderance of evidence is in favor of claimant, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES G. MATHES.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I call up bill (S. 2220) granting a pension to James G. Mathes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James G. Mathes, late a corporal of Company L, Eighth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which gives a clear statement of this case, is herewith adopted:

"The claimant was a private in Company L, Eighth Missouri Cavalry. He enlisted August 16, 1862, and was discharged June 14, 1865. The military record shows that he was treated in hospital for chronic diarrhea and debility, and that he was sick at the time of his discharge.

"The testimony furnished by physicians who have attended him shows that he has chronic diarrhea and that he has rheumatism of the spinal muscles and limbs; that he is generally broken down.

"Dr. Berry, of Carthage, Mo., says his health is bad; that he has muscular rheumatism; that he is generally broken down, and never will be able to perform full manual labor; that he is temperate and honorable in every respect.

"Dr. Dalton, of Neosho, Mo., says:

"'When I last saw him he seemed to be suffering from kidney disease and from abdominal pains. He has always appeared to me to be a run-down man—physically disabled.'

"Dr. Wills, of Neosho, Mo., says he has not been very stout and healthy since the war, and that he supposes his disability is at least one-fourth below that of a sound man. All the physicians speak positively as to his good habits and standing.

"The claimant asks for a pension for chronic diarrhea and disease of kidneys, both of which, with rheumatism, are identified by the testimony of the doctors referred to above. An examination by the medical board in 1883 pronounces him entirely free from disease. An examination by this board in 1885 rates him one-half disabled.

"The doctors who have attended him and the medical board of examiners disagree to some extent, which is not an uncommon occurrence, but the aggregate of testimony shows that for a long time heretofore he has been badly broken down, and that he is still to a pensionable extent disabled.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADELISA PERRY.

Mr. RICE. I call up the bill (H. R. 4535) granting a pension to Adelisa Perry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Adelisa Perry, of Worcester, Mass., who served as a nurse during the war of the rebellion, and is now incapacitated from earning a livelihood by sickness induced by said service.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

Adeliza Perry was a nurse in the Army, working in the corps of nurses under Mrs. Dorothy Dix. Her term of service was from April 15, 1863, to July 3, 1865. She was stationed at the McDougal Hospital, New York Harbor, for four months, and was then transferred to the Balfour General Hospital, Virginia, where she remained until the hospital was closed and she was discharged the service. She alleges in a sworn statement that while in such service she contracted malaria, which resulted in so impoverishing her strength and vital energy that from that time forth she has been greatly hindered and impeded in the performance of anything like remunerative labor; that such disability to labor has constantly increased in degree as a result of malaria contracted in the service from the time she was discharged until now she is substantially disabled from all service or labor in procuring her support; that all her means of support has been derived from such labor as she has been able to perform, but with her present inability to labor she is destitute of all manner of support and without means of subsistence.

The accompanying papers on the case show that she was an enlisted nurse, and performed all the duty she claims.

The subjoined affidavit of Almon M. Orcutt, M. D., of Hardwick, Mass., explains itself:

"I have known Miss Adeliza Perry since 1849, having been the family physician of her sister with whom she resided at that time. I have been her physician at different times since that date. She enjoyed good health previous to her entering the hospitals as nurse, under Miss Dix, during the war. I know of my own personal knowledge that she was on duty up to the close of the war.

Just after her discharge from the service I prescribed for her, at which time she was suffering from malaria, and it has been her constant enemy since that date, rendering her a partial invalid all the time from its insidious attacks."

Hon. W. W. RICE, member of Congress, of Massachusetts, in a note says:

"I have known Miss Adeliza Perry since 1855. She was a teacher in the public schools of Worcester. She was a nurse during the war. Since that time she has resided in Worcester. She is in very feeble health and necessitous circumstances. She is a brave, conscientious, and faithful woman."

Roxanna W. Crooker, Port Henry, N. Y., widow of Dr. Benjamin T. Crooker, who was at different times executive officer and surgeon in charge of Balfour Hospital, states—

"That she knew Miss Perry when she was serving as nurse at Balfour during 1864 and 1865, and that she knew from her husband, as well as from all the officers there, that she was considered a most faithful and efficient nurse."

Your committee report back the accompanying bill and recommend its passage with the following amendment: Add at the end of the bill the following: "and pay her a pension of $12 per month."

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment adding, at the end of the bill, the words: "and pay her a pension of $12 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LUCY E. ANDERSON.

Mr. SWOPE. I call up the bill (S. 2301) granting a pension to Lucy E. Anderson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucy E. Anderson, widow of Maj. William A. Anderson, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

As the Senate report of the Committee on Pensions states the facts of this case, your committee adopt it as their own and attach it hereto. They recommend that the bill do pass, amended, however, by striking out the word "five," in line 9, so that it will read "pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month."

The claimant, Lucy E. Anderson, is the widow of the late Maj. William A. Anderson, who died recently in this city. A report of his military history furnished by the War Department shows that he enlisted July 20, 1861, in Company F, Twentieth Indiana Volunteers, at La Fayette, Ind., to serve three years. He was mustered in and appointed corporal of the same company July 22, 1861. From muster-in to April 30, 1862, he is reported "present;" roll for May and June, 1862, is not on file; roll for July and August, "absent on detached service with General Robinson;" for September and October, "absent on detached service, division forage-master since June 24, 1862;" from November 1, 1862, to June 30, 1863, "absent, clerk at corps headquarters since July 24, 1862;" and July and August, 1863, "present." He was appointed quartermaster-sergeant in the same regiment September 8, 1863, and is reported on rolls of field and staff to December 31, 1863, "present." He re-enlisted as a veteran volunteer February 14, 1864, and served as regimental quartermaster-sergeant to September 2, 1864, when he was mustered in as first lieutenant of Company F, in the same regiment; was appointed adjutant October 24, 1864, and reported "present" until July, 1865. He was honorably discharged July 12, 1865, at Jeffersonville, Ind.

In addition to this the claimant has filed the original commission showing that the soldier was promoted June 15, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious conduct at the battles of Boydton Road and Amelia Springs, a captain of volunteers, by brevet," &c.

Also, the commission dated August 20, 1867, "for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating in the capture of Petersburg, and the surrender of the insurgent army of Northern Virginia, a major of volunteers, by brevet."

On one of his commissions is indorsed the following list of engagements in which he participated: Hatteras Retreat, Orchards, siege of Richmond, Glendale, Malvern Hill, Second Bull Run, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Wapping Heights, Kelley's Ford, Orange Grove, Mine Run, Wilderness, Po River, Spottsylvania, North Anna, Ptolopotomy, Cold Harbor, siege of Petersburg, Deep Bottom, Strawberry Plains, Boydton Road, Five Forks, Amelia Springs, Lee's surrender.

The only record evidence of treatment in service is for diarrhea, in March, 1865. It further appears that the medical records of the regiment are not on file, and it is therefore impossible to procure evidence of this character. Your committee have, however, been furnished with the certificates of Robert Reyburn, M. D., late surgeon and brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Volunteers, and captain and assistant surgeon, United States Army, now a prominent member of the medical profession in Washington, D. C., in which he states that the late W. A. Anderson, of Company F, Twentieth Indiana Volunteers, was, during the last fourteen years of his life, under his professional care, and that the cause of his death was cerebral paralysis, complicated with chronic bronchitis. He further states that while he can not certify that the diseases from which he died were directly traceable to his military service, yet he has no doubt the exposure and arduous duties he performed as a faithful soldier so impaired his general health as to shorten his life, thus leaving his widow and child without support, and he cordially commends the application of the widow for a pension.

Dr. S. T. Radcliffe certifies to the treatment of the soldier from 1877, and that "there is no doubt most of his sickness was due to exposure and privation while serving in the Army during the late war."

B. H. Smith, late lieutenant-colonel Twentieth Indiana Regiment, certifies, under date of May 6, 1886, that he has known the late W. M. Anderson since he entered the Army in 1861; that he was then a very healthy, robust boy; that he has met him since the war a number of times, and each time, to his sorrow, saw his failing health; that he has known his parents for thirty-five years, and knew them to be free from any chronic or constitutional diseases, and is well satisfied he lost his health from Army exposure.

L. G. Patterson, of Logansport, Ind., corroborates the above, and says he repeatedly urged him to apply for a pension, but he spurned the idea of being a Government pensioner.

Hon. W. D. OWEN, a member of the present House of Representatives, indorses the statements of the last two witnesses.

Your committee are of opinion, after a careful consideration of all the facts of this case, that this brave soldier sowed the seeds of his fatal disease in the exposures and hardships of his long and gallant service; that he was for years an invalid therefrom, and that his life was shortened thereby. His widow and infant child are left destitute, and should be provided for. We therefore report back the bill, with the recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment: Add after the sixth line the words, "late first lieutenant and adjutant, Twentieth Indiana Volunteers; afterwards captain, and appointed major of volunteers by brevet for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating in the capture of Petersburg, and the surrender of the insurgent army of Northern Virginia."

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "twenty;" so as to make the provision read: "pay her a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. H. PRICE.

Mr. PETERS. I call up the bill (S. 2369) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Price.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of William H. H. Price, late of Company F, Sixty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $24 per month; and the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of said William H. H. Price on the pension-roll as a pensioner of the United States for the sum of $24 per month, said $24 per month being in lieu of all other pensions heretofore granted.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions sets forth the facts in this case clearly, and fully establish the right of the claimant to an increase. The report of the Senate committee is therefore adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Report No. 1363, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

That William H. H. Price is already on the Government rolls as an invalid pensioner to the extent of $12 per month, and on the 18th day of last June made a new declaration for an increase of pension on the ground of an increased disability growing out of an aggravation of his disease—which is anchylosis of the elbow-joint of the right arm—which application was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground "that he is now receiving the full amount of pension to which he is entitled under the law for the disability" named. In view of the papers sent to us from the Pension Office, we can not agree to this conclusion. The Government board of surgeons by whom he was examined, on the 16th day of September, 1885, duly certified to the Pension Office that the ex-soldier suffers from "complete anchylosis of the right elbow-joint, the arm being firmly held in a semiflected position, and there being a complete atrophy of all muscles of the right arm, the measurement of which is 6¾ inches, while the left arm is 9 inches." They also return that "his right arm and hand are of no value for purposes of manual labor, and his disability is equal to the loss of a hand or a foot." There appearing no evidence to the contrary, this degree of disability, under the act of March 3, 1883, entitles the pensioner to $24 per month.

We therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "thirty" where it occurs therein, and by inserting in each case in lieu thereof the word "twenty-four," and that, as so amended, said bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MALITTY ROSE.

Mr. BARBOUR. I desire to call up the bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the heirs of Malitty Rose.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay James E. Rose, Jane Godfrey, and Francis Patton, the only surviving children of Malitty Rose, deceased, the money due upon reissue certificate numbered 3259, and issued to the said Malitty Rose three weeks prior to her death, as the widow of Elias Rose, late a private in Captain McCoy's company, United States Infantry, of the Florida war.

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) was read, as follows:

The equivalent of this bill having been reported favorably by this committee (vide H. R. 2585 and report thereon, No. 816), and also by the Committee on Claims (see report No. 1813), during the first session of this Congress, and having carefully considered the Senate report on this bill they concur therein, and recommend the passage of the bill.

It appears from the papers on file in the Pension Office that Malitty Rose was the widow of Elias Rose, private in Captain McCoy's Company, United States Infantry, engaged in the Florida war. Under act of Congress, approved February 3, 1853 (section 4732, R. S.), the said Malitty Rose was granted a widow's five-year one-half pay pension. Said pension commenced December 3, 1853, and expired December 3, 1858.

On June 3, 1857, six months before the expiration of her five-year grant, an act (now section 4725) was approved, continuing that class of pensions for life. After the expiration of the five-year grant the Pension Office dropped the name of Malitty Rose from the roll, and did not continue her as a pensioner for life, as provided by said act of June 3, 1858.

On March 29, 1879, she made application for restoration and accrued pension from date her name was dropped from the pension-roll. On June 9, 1879, she was restored to the roll and paid a pension from date of completion of evidence, in accordance with section 4713, R. S.

This section provides that when an application has not been filed within three years of the termination of the pension previously granted the pension under said application shall commence from date of completing the evidence. The claimant made several unsuccessful attempts between the years 1879 and 1885 to get a reversal of above decision as to arrears; finally she took her case on appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, who, on March 5, 1885, rendered a favorable decision, using the following language: "It is believed by the Department that the provisions of section 4713 should not be applied to this case for the reason that the name of Mrs Rose was on the roll when the act of June 3, 1858, was passed, and that the act could have been properly executed in her case without requiring of her an application. The act continued the pension she was receiving at the date of its passage, and the certificate for the continued pension might properly have been issued without any action on her part," and directed that a reissue certificate be issued for the amount of accrued pension, namely, $1,556.68.

On March 17, 1880, the Pension Office notified her attorney that the reissue certificate had that day been issued and sent to the pension agent at Knoxville, Tenn.

On April 9, 1885, over three weeks after the issue of her certificate, and the pension agent had been directed to pay her the amount of accrued pension, the claimant died.

The administrator signed the vouchers and returned them to the agent, demanding the payment. He was denied. He applied to the Commissioner of Pensions to direct the payment as asked, who, in a letter to the attorney dated July 22, 1885, declined to do so, giving as a reason the law as expressed in section 4718 Revised Statutes. He then applied to the Secretary of the Interior, asking payment upon the ground that the Government should not profit by its own wrong in first dropping the name of Malitty Rose from the roll, in direct opposition to the provisions of act of June 3, 1858, which declared the pension should continue for life; second, in refusing payment of accrued pension in June 9, 1879, and thereafter until March 5, 1885; third, in the long withholding of the vouchers (for over three week) and negligence of duty by the pension agent; and fourth, that the decision of March 5, 1885, was rendered by a competent tribunal. Hence the question was res adjudicata, the character of pension had ceased, and was thereafter one of the settlement of a judgment against the United States.

This appeal was decided adversely to the estate by the Secretary of the Interior, upon the ground "that no equity powers in the matter are vested" in his Department. The administrator of the estate of Malitty Rose now applies to Congress for relief. Her son files the following affiadavit with your committee:

CITY OF WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the place above named, James E. Rose, who deposes and says as follows: I am the son of Malitty Rose, deceased, widow of Elias Rose, a soldier in the Florida war; I am fifty years of age, and have no means of support except by daily labor. I have two sisters, named Mrs. Jane Godfrey, aged about fifty-seven years, and Mrs. Frances Patton, aged about fifty-four years, and neither of said sisters have any property, and are dependent upon their own labor and that of their husbands for support; that the last-named is in very feeble health, resulting from the care and confinement incident to nursing her mother during the last years of her life; that the house and lot left her by her mother in recognition of her services in caring for her mother as above described will have to be sold to settle the indebtedness against the estate if we can not get the money due us from the Government.

J. E. ROSE.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 3d day of May, 1886.
EMMA M. GILLETT, Notary Public.

The following indorsements of Mr. Rose are also filed:

Mr. James E. Rose is well known to me, and I feel confident that any statements he may make concerning himself or others can be accepted as the truth.
JNO. B. SMOOT, Mayor.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., March, 1886.

I cordially indorse what is said of Mr. James E. Rose by Mayor Smoot.
K. KEMPER.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., March 18, 1886.

I certify that Mr. James E. Rose is in my employment, at the wages of $9 per week.
J. H. D. SMOOT.

ALEXANDRIA, VA., March 18, 1886.

From the facts before us, we are satisfied that it was through no neglect on the part of the claimant that she failed in receiving her accrued pension before her death. We are equally well satisfied that it was through the erroneous acts of the agents of the Government, particularly through the act of the pension agent in retaining the vouchers in his hand for so long a period as three weeks after the issuing and mailing to him of the certificate.

Your committee are of the opinion, however, that provision should be made so that the money when appropriated will be available for her children only, and your committee therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute, and recommend that it pass as reported.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

FRANZ ROSSRUCKER.

Mr. STRAIT. I call up the bill (H. R. 7732) for the relief of Franz Rossrucker:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Franz Rossrucker, late a private in Company A, Fifth Wisconsin Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. O'HARA) was read, as follows:

Soldier was drafted and served as a private, Company F, Fifth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, November 19, 1864; discharged July 11, 1865; filed declaration for pension, alleging that he contracted rheumatism at Petersburg, Va., May, 1865; contracted chronic diarrhea at Jeffersonville, June, 1865, and intermittent fever at Chicago in July, 1865.

George D. Wilber, surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies:

"That from the 1st of October, 1864, to the summer of 1865, during his medical services, he knew claimant, who occasionally attended surgeon's call and was treated on divers occasions for muscular rheumatism. Said disease was caused, in deponent's opinion, by unavoidable exposure to wet and cold and all the vicissitudes of weather incident to camp life of a soldier and hardships and privations inseparable from active duty in camp, on picket, and in the field, especially such as claimant experienced at Hatcher's Run about the middle of February, 1865. The men of his regiment, being unsheltered or unprotected, and obliged to lie on the cold ground, suffered terribly from a storm of rain and sleet, which formed, as it fell, a sheet of ice on the ground.

"The storming and carrying of the rebel works in front of Fort Fisher, when the men of said regiment advanced to the charge through a small but deep stream of water; the subsequent pursuit of the retreating rebel army; the battle of Sailor's Creek, when said men forded Sailor's Creek up to their waists in water; the skirmish with the enemy at Farmington, Va., and other rapid pursuits at Appomattox, Va.; the countermarch thence to Burk's Station or Junction, Virginia; the forced march of the Sixth Corps to Danville, Va., to intercept Johnston's force; that said claimant was transported homeward as far as Jeffersonville, Ind., via Parkersburg, W. Va., during which trip he was seized with an acute attack of dysentery, which degenerated into chronic diarrhea or dysentery; that on his way home from Jeffersonville he was exposed to a cold night air at Chicago, Ill., without shelter, and there contracted intermittent fever, and that soldier's health has been permanently injured from said causes."

William J. Baker, second lieutenant of soldier's company, testifies:

"That at the battle of Sailor's Creek, Virginia, the said soldier contracted a severe cold, and was excused from duty several times after, on account of sickness. Soldier complained of soreness and lameness of feet and legs, and was troubled with diarrhea at different times."

Belchazzar Newhisel, comrade, testifies:

"That soldier was healthy at the time of his enlistment until about June, 1865, when he was troubled very much with diarrhea. For nine years after he came home from the Army I knew of his being troubled with diarrhea."

Paul Schruner testifies:

"I met claimant at Madison. He was then sick with diarrhea and intermittent fever."

Dr. Robert L. Telfair testifies:

"That he treated claimant in 1865 for chronic diarrhea. He was at that time prostrate to his bed. These facts are taken from his books."

John Zanker and George Zanker testify as to the claimant's being troubled with chronic diarrhea, from his discharge, more or less every year from 1865 till 1874.

John Fetman testifies:

"That he has known claimant since 1874, and that said acquaintance has continued up to date, and that claimant was unable to do an ordinary laborer's day's work by reason of weakness arising from sickness caused by diarrhea and rheumatism, and the claimant suffers especially from rheumatism during the colder season of the year."

Michael Dithelm testifies to the same state of facts.

Dr. James H. Dunn testifies:

"That he has treated claimant several times for lumbago or rheumatism of the muscles of the back. From his experience with claimant he believes him to be suffering from chronic rheumatism with occasional acute or subacute attacks. Claimant is unable to do much labor of any kind and will not be likely ever to regain much of his former strength."

The board of examining surgeons at Saint Paul rates him one-half total for disability caused by rheumatism.

Soldier being drafted into the service of the United States, he can not be called upon to prove prior soundness. The evidence of the surgeon, G. W. Wilbur, and of Lieut. William J. Baker clearly establishes the fact that soldier incurred his disability in the line of duty, and in the service of the United States. The testimony of comrades and neighbors establishes the continuance of said disability from discharge till the present.

Your committee are of the opinion that the soldier is entitled to a pension, and on the evidence ought to have been admitted in the Pension Office. We therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH AND MARY GLASSBRENER.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10093) for the relief of Elizabeth Glassbrener and Mary Glassbrener.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of Elizabeth Glassbrener and Mary Glassbrener, and pay to each of them a pension of $12 per month, as dependent sisters of George Glassbrener, late of Company D, Seventeenth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

John George Glassbrener, brother of these claimants, enlisted as a private in Company D, Seventeenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, June 12, 1861, and served his country faithfully until June 2, 1862, when he was stricken with disease and died in hospital at Corinth, Miss.

Elizabeth and Mary Glassbrener were the dependent sisters of this soldier, depending wholly upon him for support. They are now both feeble in body and mind, well advanced in years, both totally deaf, and dependent upon the charity of strangers who are under no obligation whatever for their maintenance.

Henry Lang testified that—

"He is acquainted with Elizabeth and Mary Glassbrener; that they are sisters of the deceased soldier; that they came with him from Germany in 1855, and first took up their home in Madison, Ind., where affiant then lived; that he was intimately acquainted with the deceased soldier and these claimants until the time of soldier's enlistment, in 1861; that during all the time he lived in America he was unmarried, lived with and supported his said sisters; that the family record, now in the possession of the affiant, shows that the deceased soldier's father and mother died prior to his coming to America in 1855; that the soldier sent his money home to his sisters from the Army until his death. Since his death Elizabeth and Mary have been entirely dependent upon the charity of strangers. Affiant, who is no relation whatever to them, took and has kept and supported Elizabeth, and for the last sixteen years Mary has resided in the family of Bernard Klier, also a stranger; that affiant is now sixty years of age, and unable longer to support her, and is under no obligation to continue his charity toward said Elizabeth. Affiant further states that when said sisters were quite young they sustained an affliction whereby they became totally deaf, and they are very weak and feeble, and neither able to earn anything, not even their support; that said sisters have no money or property of any description, but for a long time, to wit, fifteen years prior to his enlistment, they were entirely dependent upon, and were wholly supported by, the said John George Glassbrener, and since his death have been and are still objects of charity."

John G. Lay and George Kitzenger, in their affidavits, corroborate all set forth in the above affidavit. They are intimately acquainted with the claimants, and know them to be dependent upon strangers for their subsistence.

No pension certificate has been issued in behalf of any person as a beneficiary of this deceased soldier. Elizabeth and Mary Glassbrener are the only living representatives entitled in equity to receive the same.

From the evidence before your committee we are of the opinion this is a meritorious claim, and that undoubtedly these claimants are entitled to receive that support which was withheld when the soldier died. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINERVA ABBEY.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to Minerva Abbey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Minerva Abbey, the blind daughter of James D. Abbey, deceased, late of Company I, Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The claimant in this case is the daughter of James D. Abbey, late of Company I, Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry. Her father died in the service in 1864, and in 1867 a pension was granted to the widow and minor children. In 1875 this claimant became sixteen years of age and the pension ceased under the general law. In 1877 the widow remarried and has since died. This daughter has been almost blind from infancy. She is utterly incapable of earning a support, and is an object of charity. This bill proposes to pay her the same rate of pension to which the mother would be entitled had she not remarried. Congress has repeatedly recognized the principle involved in this bill by the passage of similar acts. The evidence showing the present condition of claimant is strong, and places that matter beyond doubt. The soldier gave his life to his country. His helpless daughter, deprived of her natural support, asks Congress for the same relief that has so often been granted in similar cases.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM M'FADDEN.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask to have taken up the bill (H. R. 6027) granting a pension to William McFadden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William McFadden.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Claimant enlisted in Company F, Ninth Kentucky Cavalry, August 4, 1862, and discharged September 11, 1863.

Claimant applied for pension based upon injury to left leg at Perryville, Ky., October 8, 1862, by his horse falling on him.

Claim rejected on the ground that varicose veins of the left leg developed since the war, and has no necessary or provable connection with the injury of 1862.

The origin of the alleged injury is shown by the testimony of James J. Howksby and Lieut. L. A. Black. Mr. Howksby testifies that he helped claimant up, pulled a splinter out of his leg, and dressed the injury. His leg bled profusely. Lieutenant Black says he saw claimant's leg two to four days after the injury originated. Claimant left the company because he was lame and not able to do duty. When claimant came out of the service his leg was badly swollen, looked purple, and had large knots on it.

Mr. Sibby Boyle testifies that when claimant was discharged he came to affiant's house and remained about one year. Affiant examined his leg, on which the veins were knotted, and says:

"About a week or two weeks before his discharge he was at my house and had a tub of water in which to bathe his legs, when he told me how the injury originated. He walked lame.

"Have seen his leg many times when he bathed it."

In the opinion of your committee the claim is meritorious, and they recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

H. H. DODD.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I call up the bill (H. R. 9401) granting an increase of pension to H. H. Dodd.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to H. H. Dodd, late of Company C, Sixteenth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteers, and to pay him, from and after the passage of this act, $50 per month.

An amendment reported by the committee to strike out "fifty" in line 7, and insert "forty," was read.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The files from the Pension Office in this case show that claimant was pensioned for rheumatism in 1877, and is now receiving $30 per month, the amount allowed for total inability to perform manual labor. His application for an increase was rejected March 16, 1886. The examining board at Independence, Kans., February 24, 1886, report as follows:

"He is drawn all out of shape, and, when able to be up, walks with difficulty. There is a marked atrophy of all muscles of the right side, and the ribs of the right side are contracted. He is very anæmic, weak, and feeble. Heart hypertrophied, irritable, and irregular. He requires the attendance of another person fully one-half of the time. He suffers constantly and is totally disabled all of the time. He is in our opinion entitled to a total first-grade rating. His height is 5 feet 8 inches; weight, 110 pounds."

It will be seen that the examining board recommend a total first-grade rating, which is $50 per month. The law fixes this rating only in cases requiring "the regular personal aid and attendance of another person." No reason is given for rejecting the application for increase, but your committee presume it is founded on the claim of the examining board's report, which says "he requires the attendance of another person fully one-half of the time." Unfortunately the law provides for no rating between that of total inability to perform manual labor, which is $30 per month, and that condition of utter helplessness "which requires the regular personal aid and attendance of another person."

The condition of this soldier is much worse than that of his comrade, who is simply disabled from the performance of manual labor, and Congress has never refused to make the distinction in cases as marked as this. There seems to be no reason to hope that he will ever be any better, but, on the contrary, that his disability will continue to increase until he becomes utterly helpless.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the word "fifty," in line 7, and inserting the word "forty-five."

Mr. WALLACE. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$45" and inserting "$30."

Mr. PERKINS. This man is now receiving a pension of $30 a month. I know him personally; and the Committee on Invalid Pensions truly state in the report that this amount of pension does not do him justice. He is much more infirm, much more incapacitated for work than those who, under the general law, are entitled to $30 per month. Yet, as he is not so disabled as to require the constant services of an attendant, he is not under the general law entitled to the higher pension of $50 per month. Still, according to the finding of the examining board of surgeons at Independence, Kans., he suffers under such great disability as to require the services of an attendant at least half of the time. He has to be assisted in getting into and out of bed, and assisted in dressing, though after he is dressed and on his feet he is able, to some extent, to go about. In my judgment he ought to receive $50 per month, as provided in the original bill. But we are willing to accept the recommendation of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WALLACE] will not prevail.

The amendment of Mr. WALLACE was not agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to amend the amendment of the committee so as to make the pension $35 per month. I think some respect ought to be paid to the opinion of the Pension Office. If the condition of the claimant is so bad as it is represented——

Mr. PERKINS. But, if the gentleman will permit me, the difficulty is that the Pension Office, under the existing law, can not do any better for him than allow him the pension of $30, because there is no intermediate grade of pension between $30 and $50. To entitle him to $50 he must be so disabled as to require the constant services of an attendant, which, as I have suggested, is not his actual condition, though he does need assistance in getting to and from bed, in dressing, in washing, &c.; yet, as, after being dressed and upon his feet, he can go about without an attendant, the Pension Office can not grant him more than $30 a month. In the judgment of the committee he is entitled to a larger pension than that, and they have recommended an allowance of $45 per month.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I hope my friend from Louisiana will allow this bill to go through, as this is a case where a member knows the person and states before the House the precise facts.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in connection with this case that the committee were unanimous in recommending the pension at the rate of $45 per month. It has been the uniform practice of the committee where a person is pensionable requiring partial attendance of one person, although not requiring the attendance of another person all the time, to fix the rate at $45. The examining board which examined into this matter recommended $50. The law used the expression, however, "requiring the personal attendance of another person," and the Pension Office decided the proof did not show he required the attendance of another person all the time. The Invalid Pension Committee in all cases where a man is suffering as this man is has allowed a pension of $45 a month.

Mr. WALLACE. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK DIERKING.

On motion of Mr. BURNES, the bill (H. R. 8818) granting a pension to Frederick Dierking was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Dierking, late of Company A, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

Dierking enlisted in Company H, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers, December 13, 1861, and was discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability, June 12, 1862, because of double inguinal hernia. He applied for pension on account of gunshot wound of left lumbar region, received at battle of Shiloh, Tenn., April 6, 1862, and double inguinal hernia received at the same time and place. His claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that there is no pensionable degree of disability from the gunshot wound, and that the hernia existed prior to enlistment. The rejection for the latter disability is based upon the statement of Surgeon McMartin, made in the certificate of disability, to the effect that claimant was afflicted with double inguinal hernia before enlistment.

The record shows that claimant was wounded at the time and place alleged, but furnishes no information, except as above stated, regarding the double hernia. The surgeon heretofore referred to had no personal knowlege of claimant's physical condition prior to enlistment, neither was he advised thereof through official sources, because the certificate of disability states that no descriptive roll is on file at the hospital. Claimant is a German, and, as shown in evidence, was at that time unable to speak English intelligently. In support of his claim, he has filed the affidavit of a number of neighbors who have known him for many years in Germany as well as in this country, some of whom crossed the ocean with him, and who are shown to be reputable persons, setting forth in the most positive terms claimant's freedom from hernia at enlistment.

Claimant in his own behalf testifies that he was wounded about 8 or 9 o'clock on the morning of the battle; he then made his way toward the hospital boat, being closely pushed by some of the enemy. The only person with him was comrade Roesch. On the way to the boat he was compelled to jump a ditch. Shortly thereafter he felt something give away, accompanied by a sharp, stinging pain in the abdomen. This injury developed into a double hernia before he reached the hospital at Cincinnati.

Corporal Roesch testifies that he was with the claimant when making his way toward the hospital boat after having been wounded, and then heard him complain of pains in his belly. Was intimately acquainted with the claimant prior to and during service, and would have known it had he been ruptured prior to the battle of Shiloh.

In view of the adverse record, heretofore referred to, and the positive parole evidence of prior soundness, the case has been undergoing special examination by the officers of the Pension Office.

While this special examination has failed to elicit any further information as to the precise circumstances under which the injury was incurred, yet nothing has been obtained, after the most careful and thorough inquiries on the part of the examiners', to corroborate the adverse statement of the surgeon.

Medical examination shows a large scar immediately above the crest of the left ileum; the cicatrix is large. Ball entered over the anterior portion of tenth rib, passed downward and backward and made exit about 3 inches from point of entrance. The hernial protrusions are very large, completely burying the penis.

While there may not be a great degree of disability from the wound, there is a very serious disability by reason of double hernia. That the same was contracted under the circumstances alleged, there can hardly be any doubt. No person suffering from such an unusual large hernia could have served for months without it coming to the knowledge of his comrades.

Believing that claimant is entitled to the relief asked for, your committee report favorably on accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE SCHNEIDER.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, a bill (H. R. 306) granting a pension to George Schneider, was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Schneider, late a private in Company G of the Third Regiment of United States Artillery.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 306) for the relief of George Schneider, beg leave to report that this soldier enlisted in Company G of the Third Regiment of United States Artillery, on the 21st day of July, 1840, and was discharged from the service on the 21st day of July, 1845, by reason of expiration of term of service.

He alleges that he became afflicted with scurvy in March, 1841, while in the line of his duty as a soldier, and as the result of being compelled to eat unwholesome food. His military record shows that he was sick during the months of March and April, 1841, although the nature of the disease is not specified, but the other evidence in the case, being the testimony of the claimant himself, of Dr. G. H. Fuller, of Buda, Ill., and of neighbors of the claimant, satisfies your committee that this soldier is disabled in a pensionable degree; that the disability resulted from scurvy; that the disease (scurvy) was contracted by him in the line of his duty as a soldier, as alleged in his application for pension now on file in the Pension Office; and we therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

CLEMENTINE HARTINGER.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, the bill (H. R. 10025) granting a pension to Clementine Hartinger was taken up, and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Clementine Hartinger, dependent mother of W. H. Peters, late of Company C, Twenty-fourth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the purpose of this act being to restore her to the pension-roll.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Clementine Hartinger is the dependent mother of W. H. Peters, late of Company C, Twenty-fourth Regiment Iowa Volunteers.

Peters was wounded at the battle of Champion Hills, Mississippi, and died from said wounds a few days thereafter. His mother was placed upon the pension-roll, and received a pension until November 10, 1867, when her name was dropped by reason of her marriage with John Hartinger.

It is very satisfactorily proven by testimony on file in the Pension office that Mrs. Hartinger was insane at the time of this marriage, and was within six months thereafter confined in the Iowa Hospital for the Insane, and was so confined for nearly three years.

During her confinement in the insane hospital her husband deserted her, and refused to live with or provide for her after her discharge. She was then divorced from him, and he has since died. She has since been either in the poor-house or supported by the contributions of friends, and is now old and in abject poverty.

Her pension ceased upon remarriage, as provided by section 4708, Revised Statutes, and can not legally be restored by the Pension Office; but in view of her helpless and irresponsible condition when this marriage was contracted, your committee do not believe she should be held accountable for such act, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROSELLA E. HIBBERT.

On motion of Mr. ROCKWELL, a bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert, was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Rosella E. Hibbert, daugher of Franklin M. Hibbert, late of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, at the rate of $20 a month.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert, have considered the same, and, adopting the accompanying Senate report as their own, report the bill back to the House favorably and recommend its passage with the following amendment: Strike out in last line of the engrossed bill the word "twenty," and substitute therefor the word "twelve," so that the bill will read "twelve dollars a month."

[Senate Report No. 834, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2098) granting a pension to Rosella E. Hibbert, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant, Rosella E. Hibbert, is the daughter of Franklin M. Hibbert, late of Company F, Twenty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers. It appears from the evidence that the soldier died on the 16th day of May, 1864. He was married, but his wife died February 2, 1863. Only one child survives, the present claimant, who was pensioned at the rate of $8 per month, commencing May 16, 1864, the date of the soldier's death, which pension was continued until she arrived at the age of sixteen years, to wit, February 1, 1879, since which time she has received no pension.

The present application proposes to put her on the pension-roll at the rate of $20 a month, and the reasons for such action are well set forth in the following affidavit of W. M. Pease, M. D., dated at Otis Center, Mass., March 26, 1886:

"This certifies that I, W. M. Pease, of Otis, have known Rosella E. Hibbert for about three years. She is a person between 3 and 3½ feet in height. She is twenty-three years of age, with the mental capacity of a child five or six years of age. There is no hope of any improvement. She is unable to help support herself in the smallest degree."

From all the evidence in this case, your committee are of the opinion that this claimant still remains, to all intents and purposes, a helpless child. It appears that she is the only survivor of the family of the soldier, and we think that the pension asked for in this bill should be granted. We therefore report the bill back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I move to insert at the end of the bill "to be paid to her legally constituted guardian for her use and benefit."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET R. JONES.

On motion of Mr. LORE, the bill (H. R. 10082) to increase the pension of Margaret R. Jones was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Margaret R. Jones, widow of the late Col. James Hemphill Jones, of the United States Marine Corps, who died on the 17th day of April, 1880, from $30 to $50.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read, as follows:

They find that the petition of the widow, Margaret R. Jones, clearly and fairly states the facts, and they herewith incorporate it in the report.

They also find that several bills enacting similar legislation have become laws, and they therefore report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, Margaret R. Jones, respectfully represents that she is the widow of the late Col. James Hemphill Jones of the United States Marine Corps, who died while in the service of the United States, on the 17th day of April, 1880, from pneumonia, contracted in the line of duty while commander of the marine barracks at Boston navy-yard, and in consequence of which your petitioner has been granted a pension of $30 per month (Navy pension No. 2709).

Your petitioner respectfully states that the records of the Navy Department will show that her late husband, during his thirty-nine years of continuous active service, performed his duty faithfully and honorably, and distinguished himself by acts of personal gallantry and self-sacrifice while on the field of battle during the late war and on other occasions while in command of the marine forces.

Your petitioner would respectfully state, that owing to the innate modesty of her late husband, who refrained from relating to her in detail any of the very many acts of valor and bravery performed by him, she is unable at this time to present them in detail; but will give a few in a general way, and respectfully refers your honors to a detailed statement of the many and varied commands held by him, which is given herein below:

When a history of the Marine Corps was being prepared, several years ago, giving the service of its members, Colonel Jones was repeatedly and earnestly requested to give a statement of his military record; but, as before stated, his modesty would not permit him to give any more than a concise history of his various, numerous, and wide-spread commands.

The only duty performed by the late Colonel Jones, of which your petitioner can give any particular data, is that at the first battle of Bull Run. When the war of the rebellion, or late war, was first begun Colonel Jones, at his earnest request—he being very desirous of engaging actively on the field of duty—was ordered from the Mediterranean to take command of a company at the aforesaid battle-ground, where he distinguished himself by gallantry and bravery on the field, and during the engagement was slightly wounded by a spent ball which had killed one of his lieutenants. Also, during the Chinese war he was detailed for duty on shore for ten months to protect the property of the English and Americans in China.

As before stated, Colonel Jones was in the service continuously for thirty-nine years, and was off duty but one year during all that time, and that was on account of injuries received while in the line of duty, performing service on board ship. The injury caused an illness of a very serious nature, and for a time his life was despaired of; in corroboration of which you are respectfully referred to the letter of Admiral Charles H. Bell, filed herewith, which speaks of his admirable qualities as a man and officer, as well as his constant devotion to duty by struggling against indisposition when others would, under the same circumstances, have given away.

Your petitioner also respectfully states that her husband's death was hastened by what would seem to have been a malicious ill-feeling existing against him at headquarters in Washington at that time, inasmuch as he received orders bearing no date to go to League Island navy-yard, Pennsylvania, which was not in proper respect to him as commanding officer, and which much aggrieved him thereby.

The late Colonel Jones, not knowing the nature of his orders, and fearing his relief might arrive at any time from California, he commenced at once, and while laboring under a severe cold, contracted in attending the funeral of the late Rear-Admiral Thatcher, to make arrangements to leave Boston. To facilitate matters as much as possible he was obliged to oversee the packing of his effects during the inclement March of 1880. While thus exposed to the inclemency of the weather his cold was further increased, and finally developed into pneumonia, and in less than one week his death ensued. Thus, it will be seen, my husband's death was caused by faithfully endeavoring to obey the indefinite, vague, and disrespectful orders received from headquarters at Washington, and the anxiety and worry superinduced by his desire to facilitate the transfer contemplated and leave no reason, even under the uncertain character of the transfer order, for complaint on the part of his superiors.

Your petitioner would further call your attention to the fact that the widows of several of the officers of the Marine Corps are now, and have been for years, receiving a pension of $50 per month, whose husbands were retired for years; yet in the case of your humble petitioner her husband died in active service.

Your petitioner will now give a history of Col. James Hemphill Jones, her late husband, to which your attention is respectfully and particularly referred. Colonel Jones was born in Delaware and appointed therefrom. He was commissioned as second lieutenant March 3, 1847; served on shore with the Army in Mexico in 1847 and 1848; frigate Raritan, home squadron, 1849–'50; steam frigate Saranac, 1851; marine barracks, Philadelphia, 1852; steamer Princeton, 1852; commissioned a first lieutenant September 1, 1853; sloop Macedonian, East Indies, 1853–'54; steam frigates Mississippi and Powhatan, 1855–'56; receiving ship Ohio, Boston, 1856–'58; sloop Macedonian, 1858; steam frigate Richmond, 1860–'61; commissioned as captain, May 7, 1861; marine barracks, Washington, 1861; flagship Lancaster, Pacific squadron, 1862–'63; marine barracks, navy-yard, Washington, 1864; steamers Richmond and Susquehanna, Mediterranean squadron; with Perry's Japan squadron; engaged in battle of Bull Run; marine barracks, navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., 1864–'67; commissioned as major and lieutenant-colonel, May 10, 1864; marine barracks, navy-yard, Boston, 1871–'80; commissioned as colonel, March 16, 1879; died, April 17, 1880, while under orders to command marines, League Island, Pennsylvania.

Therefore, in view of all the facts herein stated, that my husband, Colonel Jones, has served faithfully and honorably for thirty-nine years; that his death was caused prematurely by his endeavor to comply with unusual, disrespectful, and indefinite orders; that other wives of deceased marine officers of less rank, and a shorter duration of continuous active service, are receiving a pension equal to the amount herein asked for; that your petitioner is now in necessitous circumstances; that the rate of pension formerly allowed her is insufficient for her support, your petitioner, the widow of the late Col. James Hemphill Jones, prays for an increase of her pension to $50 per month during the few years that remain to her to be dependent upon the Government in whose support and defense her husband faithfully served throughout his lifetime.

And your petitioner will ever pray.

MARGARET R. JONES.

Mr. LORE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. I make the motion because there is nothing on record to show this widow is entitled to $50 a month any more than the widow of every colonel who served in the Army. It is starting out on a new line of increasing pensions of widows of colonels to $50 a month; and at the very next session of Congress there will be fifty bills brought in here to increase the pensions of widows of colonels to $50 a month, and this will be set as a precedent. There is nothing here to show that this woman is in distress; that she is a widow with a big family; that she is helpless. There is nothing in the proof to show any of these facts, or to show that this should be made an exception to the general rule. That is the only reason why I have submitted the motion for indefinite postponement.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Chairman, I regret that my friend from Indiana takes the position he does in reference to this bill. He certainly did not clearly understand what that report embodied, or I do not think he would make this objection.

Col. James Hemphill Jones went into the naval service of the Government in 1841. He served through the Mexican war as well as through the late war, and was at the navy-yard at Boston on duty in 1880. He had been for some time in delicate health, but never left his post of duty.

He received while at Boston a vague and indefinite order. He was to comply with that order, not knowing when to expect relief which might come at any moment; and while in the execution of what he believed to be his duty he contracted the disease which in his delicate condition caused his death.

Naturally a man of delicate health, notwithstanding his condition, he adhered faithfully to the post of duty, and although he had broken down while on service in the Pacific Ocean under the flag of the United States, and notwithstanding a labor of thirty-nine years of successive and continuous work in the naval service, in which he contracted the seeds of the disease which carried him off in less than one week's sickness, he always refused to leave the service for the purpose of recruiting his health.

Now the widow states, as shown by that report, that she gets a pension of $30 from the Department under the general pension law; but she does say also that she is in necessitous circumstances, and asks that the amount may be increased, as that which she gets is insufficient for her support. Mr. Chairman, I know this lady personally. She is a delicate, refined, and cultivated woman, who stood by her husband, who had never shirked his responsibility, and never asked to be relieved from duty; always ready, always at his post; and I have letters here, a number of them, from his commanding officers, showing that when he was advised to leave his ship in the Pacific Ocean and go home, in consequence of the shattered condition of his health, he refused, and stood by his post of duty. The delicate condition of his health made the severe cold contracted, as I have said, while performing service in Boston, turn into pneumonia, and it carried him off, after a lifetime of faithful devotion and service to his country. This woman is old, and has but a few years longer to live. Her husband gave not only his life to the service of the Government, but during his lifetime his health was so bad that it was necessary to give all the pittance he received from the Government to keep himself well enough to perform his duty. He leaves the widow to-day without a dollar, an old woman on the verge of the grave, and I submit, sir, that this is an exceptional case.

The gentleman says this will establish a precedent. Why, sir, this is not by any means the first case of the kind. I hold in my hand here two or three precedents. The widow of Colonel Dulaney was pensioned at this rate; the widow of Colonel Zeilin is another case where the pension was increased in this way; and these, too, were men who were on the retired list and served but a few years. This man was in the service, as I have said, for thirty-nine years, and dropped dead, it might almost be said, in his tracks. He did his work honorably and faithfully to his country, and all we ask is to put his widow, not where he would have done if he had given his life and services in her behalf, for he was an exceedingly able man, and a brave though honest man, and I do not ask that you put his widow where she would have been if he had applied his abilities to accumulating means for her support in old age, had he occupied himself in the ordinary avocations of life instead of giving his time to his country. But all we ask is this mere pittance until in a few years she also passes to the grave and follows him whose life was given for his country.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I must confess to some hesitation in opposing a bill coming from the Committee on Pensions——

Mr. LORE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to say that the member of the Committee on Pensions who examined and made this report, after an examination of all the documents, stated, and I am authorized to use his language—the report was made by Mr. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania—that it was one of the strongest cases he had examined—one of the very best cases upon the documents and facts submitted that he had considered during the entire session.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would like to ask the gentleman one question if he will allow it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I listened to the reading of the report, and also to the statement of the gentleman from Delaware, in order to hear the special features of this case which render it proper to take it out of the operation of the general law. Granting the service of forty years, the faithful service, and that he died in the service; what are the special features entitling an increase beyond the measure of the law fixed in other cases, and especially in such a case as that of a man of equal rank who died in the service shot down on the field of battle. I had a personal friend, a colonel of my regiment, who fell by my side, shot through the brain. His widow gets but $30 a month. Why should this lady get more?

Mr. LORE. I will answer by saying that thirty-nine years of active and continuous service and devotion to duty should entitle his wife to this recognition. That of itself is a special feature of the case. Perhaps the colonel you speak of had served four or five years only, or may be less, and during his life was able to provide a support for his family. This man had no opportunity to do so. He commenced in early youth and devoted his entire life, thirty-nine or forty years to the country.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Do you think a woman is entitled to more pension for having lived with a man forty years than a woman whose husband was killed thirty-five years before? Or, in other words, do you think she should be entitled to more pension because she lived with her husband longer?

Mr. LORE. I think the woman who has lived with a man forty years, who spent all the money he had earned in the service of his country for the purpose of enabling him to do his duty to his country, ought to be pensioned.

Mr. TAULBEE. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is apparent to those who have listened to arguments in favor of these exceptional cases, that each case is "exceptional."

Numerous precedents have been cited in which special legislation has increased the pensions of widows from $30 to $50 a month. I, for one, am opposed to any pension that gives to the widow of any officer of the regular or volunteer service more than $30 a month. That is more than the average wages of the laboring men of this country. It has not been the policy of Congress—it is not the theory of the pension system—to grant pensions to widows on account of gallant services rendered by their husbands. It has been the policy to grant pensions because of the death of their husbands. The general law fixes the rate of pension for the widows of officers bearing the rank that Colonel Jones held at the time of his death at $30 a month.

I have listened attentively to the reading of the report and the remarks of the gentleman who supported the bill, and I fail to discover the semblance of reason why this should be made an exceptional case. I regard this extraordinary legislation as the result more properly of fanaticism or of a sentiment than of sound discretion.

If the pensions of officers holding rank equivalent to that which this officer held at the time of his death should be raised to $50 a month, then I say let us provide for that by general legislation and do away with this favoritism, which tends more to make our pension system obnoxious than any other feature of it.

It would be with great reluctance that I would oppose any pension bill that would tend to relieve the absolute suffering of the widow of any soldier or officer who had made himself efficient in the service of his country. But the soldiers, and especially the officers, of the regular Army enter that service as a matter of business. They select it as a profession, not because of any extraordinary patriotism they feel, but because they feel doubtless it is the best disposition they can make of themselves. They start into that line because they are favored with appointments to West Point or Annapolis, over, perhaps, some equally as worthy young men who are their competitors; and because they receive this personal favor at the hands of those with whom they have influence, they start out on a line which has a tendency to be built up by the legislation of this country into an aristocracy.

I read in one of the newspapers of this city not more than a week ago a statement that an officer of the regular Army had purchased a few years ago property in this city more than $300,000 in value. The question naturally arises in the mind of every man who is acquainted with the extravagant mode of living of the officers of the Army as to how it is they can afford to succeed in that line in accumulating more money than men of equal worth and intelligence can accumulate in the ordinary avocations of life.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is the gentleman afraid of an aristocracy made up of poor widows?

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not; but the tendency of extravagant pension legislation is in that direction.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask for information the gentleman from Delaware two questions?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. How old is this lady?

Mr. LORE. She is about sixty-seven years old.

Mr. NELSON. Has she any means of her own?

Mr. LORE. Not a dollar.

Mr. NELSON. Let us then compromise on $40.

Mr. LORE. She requires to have an attendant constantly with her.

Mr. TAULBEE. No, Mr. Chairman, we can not compromise on this matter whatever may be the age of this widow or whatever disability she may possess. I want to know here and now if it is the policy of Congress to pension the widows of officers because of their infirmities. I would like to have some reason given why widows of officers of the Army are to be pensioned by Congress because of disabilities they have incurred, or because of age, or because of any other reason than that merely of the death of their husbands. If I understand anything about the policy of the pension laws of this country it is that the pensions to widows are granted because of the death of their husbands, and not then except in cases where that death is attributable to the service of such officer or soldier rendered in the line of his duty.

Mr. BOUTELLE. May I be permitted to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not so well posted that I can undertake to answer all questions; but I will listen to the question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to ask the gentleman if I correctly understood him to state that he knew the case of an Army officer who had invested $300,000 in house property out of the savings of his emoluments as an officer.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not intend to make any such statement nor do I think I did. The statement I made was this, that a few days ago I noticed in one of the newspapers of this city mention of a case where an officer of the regular Army had purchased a few years ago property worth more than $300,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Exactly. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he understood from that statement that the officer in question had probably purchased that property from the savings of his emoluments as an Army officer?

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not make any such statement as that, nor do I claim that that is the case; but I can clearly see how it would be possible, notwithstanding the fact that the actual salary of the officer may not have amounted to that sum during the whole term of his service. There are uses to which money may be put by which it may be increased, and there are means which may be resorted to other than the legitimate drawing of the salary from the Government (which I understand to be the principal occupation of the officers of the regular Army) by which such amounts may be accumulated.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I understand the gentleman is reflecting upon the integrity of the officers of the Army?

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not responsible for the gentleman's understanding. I do not think my language can be fairly construed as meaning anything of that kind. I would not reflect upon the character of any gentleman, especially a gentleman who is an officer of the Army. It has not been my custom to reflect upon the character of any gentleman——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I had not the slightest idea that the gentleman intended anything of the kind; but his remark going out to the country—a remark made by a Representative upon the floor of the House—that an Army officer had invested $300,000, taken in connection with the context, would certainly give the impression that we were paying very exorbitant compensation to the officers of our Army.

Now, my impression is that as a rule the Army officers are not investing $300,000 in anything. My impression is that as a rule the officers of the Army and the officers of the Navy are notoriously—a friend in front of me suggests the word—impecunious. They are not, as a rule forehanded. The expenses incident to their duties and official position renders it practically impossible for them to accumulate much money. Occasionally some of them may, as the fair sex are naturally fond of the military, make matrimonial alliances that render them able to invest in this lavish manner, but such cases are exceptional.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman, but I do not see how that has anything to do with the merits of this case or how it touches the issue of this class of legislation which I am opposing.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did not see that either. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I see no good reason why we should make these exceptional cases, when reasons for making the exception fail to appear from the statements of gentlemen who see proper to urge such legislation. I believe that this practice of granting exceptionally large pensions to either officers or soldiers of the regular Army or of the volunteer service or to the widows of such officers is vicious in its nature and tends to an extravagance against which we ought to guard. I know that when the stories are told to the House, when the recitals of suffering and sometimes abject want are made here, they are calculated to touch the sympathies of those who hear them; but we should remember that whatever benevolence we attempt to indulge in by such legislation as this takes the money of the people whose voices are not heard in this legislation except through us. In other words, we vote away the money paid into the coffers of the Treasury by the hard-handed workingmen of this country——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And you will find most of them in the amen corner.

Mr. TAULBEE. I fail to discover such a sentiment, Mr. Chairman, among the private soldiers, either of the regular Army or of the volunteer service, to whom we owe all the victories that have been achieved by our arms. I can see no reason why the widow of the officer who during the battle occupied a bomb-proof position should be preferred over the widow of the man who walked with his musket into the very din of battle and stood in the front rank and faced the shower of bullets that came from the opposing army. Neither can I see any good reason why the widow of the officer who died suddenly (as in the present case) should be preferred over the widow of the man who fell in battle.

Mr. CRAIN. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAIN. Did not the colonels go with the privates?

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe, as a general thing, they did. There were exceptions to that, but even when they did go with them I see no reason why they should enjoy exceptional favors.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. They had no bomb-proof positions.

Mr. TAULBEE. I used that expression more with reference to the superior officers whose widows are included in this kind of legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that the private soldiers won all the victories. I wish to inquire if he voted for the pension to the widow of General Hancock, and, if so, upon what ground consistent with the views he is now uttering?

Mr. TAULBEE. If the gentleman will examine the RECORD he will find that I did not vote that way. I voted the other way.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad the gentleman was consistent. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WOLFORD. This case was carefully investigated by the committee, who were unanimous in recommending the passage of this bill. The case presents some extraordinary features, and I wish to say a few words about it. But before doing so I must pay my respects to my colleague [Mr. TAULBEE] who has made on this occasion what strikes me as one of the most extraordinary speeches that I ever heard. Surely he is mistaken in the position which he takes. Does my friend suppose that in any of the occupations of life, in the Army or in the Navy, on the land, on the sea, at home or abroad, the services of all men are exactly alike? It is the order of God Almighty that those who do much should receive much. Now, I put it to my colleague, do you want to stultify your intellect, because I must talk plainly——

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. WOLFORD. Do you want to stultify your intellect by saying that the man who, as a soldier, did little or nothing for his Government, has equal claims upon the gratitude of his country, is equally entitled to compensation from a great nation with the man who does much? Surely that is not what you mean to say, because that is not the feeling in Kentucky, the State from which we come. We estimate men and women there according to what they are and what they do—not according to what we may imagine belongs to the whole human race.

Now, do you say that the widow of a private soldier is entitled to as much at the hands of the country as the widow of the general who commanded a hundred thousand men, who was responsible for their conduct, and for their lives? Who that was ever in battle does not know that upon the commander, if he is faithful, if he is cool, if he is brave, if he does his duty, devolves a vastly greater responsibility than upon any private soldier? The private soldier may carry his gun and fight bravely, may be a gallant man, may have as much sense as the general, for there are privates who have as much intelligence as anybody; but the private soldier is not placed in such a position that the honor and glory of his men and of his country depend upon him. Therefore, according to all usages of all nations, beginning as far back as we read in history, the man who does the most is, with those who are associated with him, regarded as deserving the greatest honor.

Therefore we honor Washington above any private soldier of the Revolutionary war; and therefore we look upon Martha Washington as a greater woman than common women because she was the associate of General Washington. That is the way we look at these things. Now, I ask my friend whether he is going to start here a new theory upon pensions, and say, "We will make a kind of hotch-potch of the whole thing and pension everybody alike?" The lazy fellow who lay in his tent, who never could be got out of it in time of battle—if he dies—and he will die just like other men [laughter]—if he dies, do you propose to give his widow just as much pension as you would the widow of the gallant officer who, in fifty battles, stood by the cause of his country in every emergency? I know [addressing Mr. TAULBEE] that you are ashamed of such a view as that. [Laughter.] I know it is not in the mind of a Kentuckian to hold such a view.

But you talk about "taking the people's money." I have heard that expression before; and but for that remark I should not have said a word this evening. I have heard expressions of that kind so often from different sources in this Congress that, for one, I have grown tired of that kind of talk. "Taking the people's money!" How is it "taking the people's money?" You take "the people's money," drawn from them in the form of taxes, and you lock it up in the vaults; you keep it from the people. I am for taking "the people's money" and giving it to good, worthy ladies and good, worthy gentlemen who will put it into circulation. [Laughter.] Let the people have the money.

If you want to do exactly right upon the subject of pensions, take this money which is locked up in the vaults and put it in circulation by meeting just claims such as this. Whose money is it? It is the people's money. Then, for God's sake, do not lock it up from the people. Let them have a chance to see where it goes. And if you give it to the soldiers or to their widows, I will be responsible that it is circulated; you need have no fear on that score. [Laughter.]

Talk about "hard times!" Why, I see that so learned and great a statesman as Mr. Blaine advises you to take the surplus money from the Treasury and give it to the States. I am not in favor of that. I would rather give it to the soldier and the soldier's widow—to those who deserve it.

You say it is terrible to pension soldiers and soldiers' widows to such high amounts—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Gentlemen, do not be in a hurry; I will give you a chance to vote in a few minutes; but I am going to say what I intended to say before you vote. If you take this money out of the Treasury vaults and put it in circulation it will be all right; and is it too much to give $40 or $50 to the widow of a gallant officer in recognition of the services that he performed for his country? Is that too much?

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to ask my colleague why it is that he proposes, in supporting this bill, to give to the widow of Colonel Jones a pension of $50 a month in preference to the widows of other officers who rendered similar services, and whose widows receive only $30 a month.

Mr. WOLFORD. Why, bless your soul, I would give this amount to the widow of every one who rendered service of this kind. Surely you do not know me, or you would not ask such a question as that. I would give this pension to the widow of every one who performed anything like the same service that this man performed.

But I want to talk a minute about this case of Colonel Jones. This pension is not proposed for any ordinary service. I believe you will admit the doctrine that those who do the most service should receive the most from the Government. That is the way the people look at it, and always will look at it. Admit that; and then I want to talk a moment about what Colonel Jones did. We investigated his case very fully and carefully. What did he do? When a boy he entered the Marine Corps.

He went out upon the high seas, he went out upon the land, he went everywhere his duty to his country called him; and wherever the danger was the greatest there he was always in the thickest of the fight, which he fought gallantly in his country's defense.

He went into his country's service when a mere boy, and I believe he was even one of our gallant defenders in the war of 1812; but however that may be, I am certain that he took an active and gallant part in the Mexican war. And during the years of peace, upon our naval vessels, he guarded carefully the honor of our flag in foreign seas. Wherever he was in all the forty long years of his service, whether on land or sea, on every occasion, when duty called, he was ready to give his life up for the safety of his country and the honor of its flag. I can not go into an account of the numerous battles in which Colonel Jones was engaged; they are too numerous and would take up too much of my time, and there are other bills to be passed, and I do not wish to stand in the way of justice being done to any of our soldiers.

Something was said during this debate about colonels who could not be seen in battle. Well, that may be true about some colonels, but it is not true about Colonel Jones, for whenever he was in battle he was always seen in the front. He was always, as I have already said, in the thickest of the fight. He always stood up manfully and gallantly during the whole period of his forty years of service, and never quailed in the presence of an enemy.

Gentlemen have objected to this case as though nothing of the kind had ever been done before. Why, let me tell gentlemen similar cases have been frequently passed. There are many precedents of like character. In one case I succeeded in passing a bill, not for the widow of a colonel, it is true, but for the widow of a private soldier. I will tell my friend and colleague from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that he will never be able to see the time when the Congress of the United States will refuse to grant relief in such cases, where the widow of an officer who served so long and so gallantly and in so many wars comes here and asks that she may be pensioned in like manner with other widows whose cases have been disposed of favorably in the past.

If we have no sympathy for this widow who asks us to relieve her in her hour of distress, then we can have sympathy for nobody. If those who laid down their lives for their country—I do not mean those who from sudden impulse were induced to go forward and be killed, but those who gave up their whole lives to the defense of their country—if those men are to have their widows neglected, if the Congress of the United States is to turn a cold ear to the prayers of their widows when in distress they ask for the pensions which were promised to them, then we might as well abandon the whole pension system. But I do not believe such is the disposition, and certainly such has not been the practice of either House of Congress, but, on the contrary, relief has been promptly granted in all cases of the kind which have been presented to our consideration.

In this case the committee carefully examined into the facts and came to the conclusion that the widow of Colonel Jones was fully and justly entitled to this pension. The facts show that Colonel Jones was a faithful officer and that his men loved him and that he loved them. His services in battle for his country will never be forgotten; and if it be true that the spirits of the just look down upon us, the spirit of this gallant man I hope will witness, by our action to-night in granting this pension to his widow, that we have been loyal and true to our promise to take care of the widows and orphans of those who died in the service of their country. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky is a member of the Committee on Pensions, from which this bill comes, and if I heard him correctly he stated in this debate, as did the gentleman from Delaware, that Colonel Jones was a soldier in the war of 1812. Let me inquire of him whether that really is the fact?

Mr. LORE. I have not stated that Colonel Jones was engaged in the war of 1812, but I did state that he was not only a gallant officer in the late war, but that he was in the Mexican war.

Mr. WOLFORD. What I said was that Colonel Jones entered the service of the United States when a mere boy, and that it was probable he had served in the war of 1812, but on reflection and without knowing the fact certainly, I am inclined to believe that he was not engaged in that war. He was, however, in the war with Mexico and served gallantly throughout the civil war, and received the thanks of his country for his gallantry when he was wounded in battle, and I hope my friend from Indiana will be induced to vote for this bill which grants a pension to his widow. She is left in needy circumstances and the Congress of the United States has the right to take into consideration the poverty of the widow of a gallant officer, who for so many years rendered such efficient service. I do not believe, notwithstanding what has been said, there will be any disposition on the part of the House to do anything else than unanimously pass this very just bill. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 17.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to make it $40 a month, and I do it for the purpose of preventing the establishment of a bad precedent. I do not wish to make the point of no quorum, but I do wish to prevent the establishment of a bad precedent. I move to strike out "$50" and insert in lieu thereof "$40."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE L. SHEDD.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar, called up by Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, was the bill (H. R. 10104) granting a pension to Caroline L. Shedd.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Caroline L. Shedd, foster-mother of George C. Shedd, late of Company I, Thirtieth Iowa Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

Claimant is the foster-mother of George C. Shedd, a corporal in Company I, Thirtieth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, who was killed in battle near Vicksburg, Miss., May 22, 1863. The evidence shows that claimant married the father of this soldier in 1847, when soldier was a mere child. At time of soldier's enlistment the father was an invalid, owning a small farm in Iowa, upon which the son worked to support his parents. After enlistment he sent them promptly his pay as he received it. In 1876 the father died, and claimant is now destitute, depending on others for her support. It appears that she did all for the soldier that his own mother could have done, and that the soldier in return loved and cared for her as a son for a mother. Several cases similar have been favorably reported from this committee and acted upon by Congress, and this case seems an especially strong one.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM B. EVE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. TAULBEE) was the bill (H. R. 8720) granting a pension to William B. Eve.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William B. Eve, late second lieutenant of Company H, Forty-ninth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

William B. Eve enlisted as a second lieutenant, Forty-ninth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, on the 22d of December, 1863, and was discharged on the 26th of December, 1864, on surgeon's certificate of disability, for chronic diarrhea.

Claim was rejected on the ground that the disability was incurred prior to enlistment in the United States service.

Abundant testimony is adduced by claimant's officers and family physician showing that he was a sound man prior to enlistment, and especially free from diarrhea.

Stephen Golden, captain of claimant's company, states that he had known claimant for the last fifteen years; that he contracted chronic diarrhea while in service and line of duty at Camp Nelson, Kentucky. He was a man of good, sound health at time of enlistment.

Thomas Catron, captain Company B, claimant's regiment, states claimant contracted chronic diarrhea at Camp Nelson, Kentucky, while in service and line of duty.

James H. Tinsley, regimental adjutant, makes affidavit same as above.

Dr. J. M. Dishman, of Barboursville, Ky., states while claimant was in service he came home sick with chronic diarrhea; treated him for same; he had said disease when discharged, and has had it ever since.

Jesse Mallingley, first lieutenant, makes substantially same statement as Captain Golden; also Thomas N. Jones, Henry Smith, George W. Brown, and John C. Dixon, comrades of claimant's regiment, bear testimony to the same.

Assistant Surgeon H. W. Hogan states that on or about May 10, 1864, at Camp Burnside, Ky., claimant contracted chronic diarrhea, result of fatigue, &c.; treated him for said disease from May, 1864, until his discharge. Before said May, 1864, claimant was, in affiant's opinion, a sound, healthy man, and affiant knows that he was free from chronic diarrhea.

N. C. Miller, regimental surgeon of claimant's regiment, testifies that claimant was afflicted with chronic diarrhea in May and June, 1864, and on his certificate of said disability he was granted leave of absence; he also testifies that in his opinion claimant was suffering with diarrhea for six months prior to that time.

The evidence is conclusive that since claimant's discharge from the service he has suffered from chronic diarrhea, and at no time has he been able to perform manual labor in such a degree as to make his living.

T. S. Manning, examining surgeon, in examination April 29, 1885, gives him a rating of total.

After a thorough examination of the testimony on file in this case, your committee are of the opinion that claimant incurred his disability while in the service and in the line of duty, and think the claim a meritorious one.

They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRIGG. Mr. Chairman, under the order for Friday evenings we take up, I believe, as well as pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities. There are on the Calendar three bills of this character, two of the Senate and one of the House.

I believe they usually pass without objection, and I therefore ask that they be taken up and passed.

There was no objection.

JOHN K. MITCHELL.

The bill (S. 2721) to remove the political disabilities of John K. Mitchell was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the disabilities of John K. Mitchell, of the State of Virginia, imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are the reports to be read in these cases?

Mr. TRIGG. The reports are very brief, and I presume it is not necessary to read them.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN P. LOYALL.

The bill (S. 2848) for the relief of Benjamin P. Loyall, of the State of Virginia, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Benjamin P. Loyall, of the State of Virginia, is hereby relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

S. BARRON.

The bill (H. R. 9854) to remove the political disabilities of S. Barron, of Virginia, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the disabilities incurred by S. Barron, of Virginia, under and by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and are hereby, removed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNIE E. GARDINER.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I now ask to take up and consider the bill (S. 2660) granting a pension to Annie E. Gardiner.

The bill was read at length.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that the Senate bill is reported by the Committee on Pensions. The report was sent to the printer and has not been returned. If the committee see proper to so order it can be published in the RECORD.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will ask unanimous consent that it be published, and that we proceed now to consider the bill.

Mr. WALLACE. How do we know what we are voting on? We do not know anything about this bill. I should like to have the report read or some explanation of it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will state briefly, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on Pensions concur in the report of the Senate committee on this bill. That report states that Major Gardiner was educated at West Point; that he entered the service in 1841; that he was through the Mexican war, and contracted disability which necessitated medical treatment in 1852. In 1859 he was retired, and in 1879 died. His widow made application though the proper channel in the Pension Office, but the claim was rejected, the reason of the rejection being that, although her husband received his disability while in the service of the United States, it was not in time of war; but the Senate committee reported that there was evidence, which, however, was not conclusive, that the disability was contracted in the Mexican war.

Although the evidence was not conclusive, they saw no reason, if the disability was contracted in the line of duty, in the service, even in time of peace, why he should not be pensioned. The Committee on Pensions of the House concur in the report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the gentleman agree to let this bill go over until next Friday?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. These are the facts embodied in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this bill can only be presented and considered now by unanimous consent, since there was an order made at the beginning of the session to-night, on motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], that the reports in all these cases were to be read.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield for that purpose, that this bill be made a special order for next Friday night and be taken up first at the beginning of the work of the session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if it be passed over now, it will retain its place on the Calendar and can be called up at any time on next Friday evening.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I would not have called it up this evening, but I saw it on the Calendar, and presumed, of course, the report was here.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Suppose you agree to the suggestion that it go over.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the bill will retain its place on the Calendar, and by consent will be the first one called up on Friday evening next.

ELIZABETH M. J. MEAGHER.

Mr. CRAIN. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8463) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. J. Meagher.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Elizabeth M. J. Meagher, widow of Thomas Francis Meagher, late a brigadier-general of United States volunteers, and to pay her a pension of $100 per month, commencing from the time of the death of the said Thomas Francis Meagher.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

Strike out the words "one hundred dollars per month, commencing from the time of the death of the said Thomas Francis Meagher," and insert in lieu thereof "fifty dollars per month."

The Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. WINANS (interrupting the reading). I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the friends of the bill think that that portion of the report which has not been read contains any good reason for the passage of the bill perhaps it would be well to read it all. I have failed as yet to hear a reason why we should pass this bill.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report (by Mr. LOUTTIT), as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8463) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. J. Meagher, widow of Thomas Francis Meagher, beg leave to submit the following report thereon:

A recital of the events in the life and career of General Thomas Francis Meagher would read like romance. A study of his power and success in the dual characters of military commander and leader of the masses in the walks of the civilian leaves undetermined the field of his superiority, so brilliant, indeed, was his career and so complete his success in each.

An exile from his native heath by reason of his active efforts in early life to relieve Ireland from the thrall of oppression, he brought with him to these shores a love for free government that became intensified and crystallized to devotion when the life of this Government was assailed. Always active in the councils of his fellow-man, resolute and determined in plan and purpose, at the first mutterings of rebellion he set about to assist in thwarting the plans of the enemies of his adopted land.

The seeds of dissension, doubt, and distrust were industriously sown in the great cities of the North by the secret allies of the common foe; riots were incited, disturbances created, and every impediment thrown in the way of those intrusted with the mission of bringing together in military organizations those who were willing to uphold and defend the integrity of the States and the permanency of its institutions with their lives, if need be.

From city to city Meagher journeyed and faced the issues and the dangers of the hour, exhorting the people of the North, and particularly those of his own race, to cast their lot, their influence, and, if need be, their lives with the Government in this its struggle for existence.

The effect of these appeals, falling from the lips of one whose record in behalf of the principles of freedom was known to all as a bright page in the history of nations, and garnished as they were with all the captivating graces of oratory, made alive and burning in the person of this leader, can now hardly be estimated.

Vast numbers of his countrymen, inspired by his example and led by his voice, joined the Union Army, and the gallant services rendered by the "Irish Brigade" under his command are well known to all familiar with the history of the famous Second Corps, Army of the Potomac.

General Meagher was commissioned brigadier-general United States volunteers February 3, 1862, having previously served as captain, and, in addition to valuable services in the field, was called thence by the President on several occasions to serve his country's needs in the North, where his presence and words of burning eloquence were required to quell threatening eruptions of the disaffected in the populous centers of the land.

To every call he responded; in each case he was found equal to the pressing emergency.

Strong in battle and all powerful in council, to the flag of his adoption and for the maintenance of those principles which had won and chained his admiration in childhood's days, he gave all the great energy and strength of maturer years.

General Meagher was breveted major-general about the close of the war, and was accidentally drowned shortly after while on his way with troops to quell an Indian disturbance in Montana Territory, of which he was then acting governor.

His widow, an estimable lady, his companion during all the scenes of his busy life herein recited, is in need, and in this her hour of adversity instinctively turns to the Government in the fond hope and strong faith that by it the past has not been forgotten. We append a letter received from Colonel Nugent by General BRADY, a member of this House, in which is contained the statement of an honorable gentleman who knew General Meagher well in his lifetime and is conversant with the present financial condition of the widow, whose chief heritage is the memory of her gallant and talented husband.

Though for more than twenty years she has refrained from asking any recognition at the hands of Congress, while about her with lavish hand were dispensed just dues and merited favors, yet, prompted by the demands of present necessities, she is an applicant for assistance and this testimonial of appreciation of the services of one dear to her as he was useful to the Union in the hours of trial and tribulation.

The military record of General Meagher is attached hereto, and we, your committee, recommend that the bill as presented be amended by stricking out all after the word "pension" in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "of fifty dollars per month," and that, as so amended, the same be passed.

MORRISANIA, NEW YORK CITY, May 17, 1886.

MY DEAR COLONEL: A bill has been presented in Congress by Mr. Woodburn, of Nevada, granting a pension to the widow of our late old and gallant commander, General Meagher. I now take the liberty of writing to you and to ask for your kind co-operation in the matter. Since the death of the general Mrs. Meagher has entirely been depending on her father (Mr. Townsend) for support, but now that the old gentleman is dead, Mrs. Meagher is in limited circumstances, and is really in need. The great services of General Meagher during the late war are certainly deserving of some recognition from the Government, and I do not know of any better way of recognizing these services than by Congress granting a suitable means for the support of his widow in this her time of need. I need not tell you of the great services rendered to the country during the late war by General Meagher whilst in command of the Irish Brigade, as they are as well known to you as they are to me. You served on his staff, and you had every opportunity of knowing all his movements. The history of General Meagher and the Irish Brigade are a part of the history of that grand and gallant old Second (Hancock's) Corps of the Army of the Potomac.

The Irish Brigade was one of the first brigades that formed a portion of the first division of the Second Corps in 1861, and served with it until the end of the war. This of itself is sufficient history to show what the services of the Irish Brigade have been. Anything I might say of the Second Corps would be useless, as the history of Hancock and the Second Corps are known all over the world. General Meagher was a true patriot at a time when patriots were wanted. He worked hard to organize the brigade, and his prompt action in forming the brigade so early in the struggle had great influence with his countrymen all over the North, and had the effect of procuring many thousands to enroll and fight under the glorious standard of the Union. His widow is deserving of a pension. It is a just claim, and I trust that you and your friends in Congress will give all the aid you can to the bill presented by Mr. Woodburn, and I can assure you that every veteran of the Irish Brigade living to-day will fully appreciate any service that you or your friends may render to this noble woman.

Very truly, your friend and comrade,

ROBERT NUGENT.

Col. JAMES D. BRADY,
Washington.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 10, 1886.

Statement of the military service of Thomas F. Meagher, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

He was appointed brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, February 2, 1862, and commanded the "Irish Brigade," of the Second Corps, Army of the Potomac, from February 8 to July 16, 1862; was on recruiting service in New York city to September 8, 1862, when he resumed command of his brigade, and served with it in the Army of the Potomac to December 22, 1862, upon which date he availed himself of twenty days' leave of absence on account of sickness (copy of surgeon's certificate herewith). On February 18, 1863, he resumed command of his brigade, and served therewith to May 18, 1863.

He had on May 8, 1863, tendered his resignation (giving as his reasons that his brigade was reduced to 500 men, and that he had failed to secure orders for its withdrawal from the field to recruit itself), and the same was accepted, to take effect May 14, 1863.

On December 23, 1863, the acceptance of his resignation was canceled, and having re-entered the service he was awaiting orders to September 13, 1864, when directed to report to General W. T. Sherman for orders; he commanded the brigades of convalescents, which subsequently became the Provisional Division, Army of the Tennessee, conducting the same from Tennessee to North Carolina, from November 15, 1864, to February 24, 1865; was awaiting orders from the latter date to May 15, 1865, when he resigned.

O. D. GREENE,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

FREDERICKSBURG, December 15, 1862.

Brig. Gen. Thomas Francis Meagher, Irish Brigade, Hancock's Division, Second Corps d'Armée, having applied for a certificate on which to ground an application for leave of absence, I do hereby certify that, having carefully examined this officer, I find that he is suffering from a furunculous abscess of the left knee, which quite disables him for active duty in the field. It is further my opinion that an absence of twenty (20) days is absolutely necessary to prevent loss of life or permanent disability.

F. REYNOLDS,
Surgeon Eighty-eighth New York Volunteers, and Acting Chief Medical Officer of Hancock's Division.

Examined, approved, and respectfully recommended.

J. W. TAYLOR,
Surgeon United States Volunteers, and Medical Director Second Army Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no objection to adopting that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is: Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to call on the friends of this bill, those who are in favor of its passage, to explain why it should pass. I have failed to discover from the reading of the report any plausible reason therefor. If there is any reason why this pension should be granted at all I would like to hear it; and I would like to hear the reason why the widow if pensioned at all should be given $50 a month instead of $30, the rate allowed by law for widows of officers of similar rank.

Mr. CRAIN. As gentlemen desire to call up other bills to-night and as I have not full command of my voice I shall not detain the House at any length, but in answer to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky I will state that the widow of Thomas Francis Meagher has never received one dollar from the Government of the United States. Ever since the close of the war, ever since the time when, under the laws of Congress, she would have been entitled to a pension, she has refrained from asking one dollar from the people of the United States through its Government as a pension to herself as the widow of one of the most distinguished officers that led the hosts in the battles for the preservation of this Union. She has been dependent upon her father as the report shows. Her father has recently departed this life. To-day she is in comparatively indigent circumstances. In view of the fact that for upwards of twenty years she has never asked one dollar from this Government, her friends in her behalf now ask that instead of the $30 a month to which she would have been entitled under the pension laws, she shall receive an extra compensation of $20 per month, making $50 per month in all.

Mr. CUTCHEON. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that General Meagher died in the service? I understood he was governor of Montana Territory.

Mr. CRAIN. He was acting governor of Montana at the time he died. He lost his life, I understand, while on the way to perform the duties of his office.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It is not claimed that he died from any disability or disease contracted in the service?

Mr. BOUTELLE. He was on duty at the time of his death, the report says. The report states that—

General Meagher was brevetted major-general about the close of the war, and was accidentally drowned shortly after, while on his way with troops to quell an Indian disturbance in Montana Territory, of which he was then acting governor. So that he lost his life when in command of United States troops.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. What position did he hold in the Union Army?

Mr. CRAIN. He was major-general by brevet. He was then in command of Union soldiers and was on his way to take the position to which he had been recently appointed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Was he in the military service of the United States at the time he was drowned?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. How, then, was it that he was governor of Montana Territory?

Mr. CRAIN. He was in charge of United States troops on his way to Montana to take the position to which he was appointed as governor of that Territory.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And he was still in the Army?

Mr. CRAIN. I understand so; but I have no knowledge of the facts beyond what the report discloses.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is not usual for one who is still an officer in the Army to become the governor of a Territory. I suggest that it might be better to let this bill be passed over as the bill just called up before was passed over, so that the facts in this case may be investigated a little. For myself, I am not able to see the connection of General Meagher with the military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside informally, to be a special order next Friday evening after the bill which has just been passed over.

Mr. CRAIN. I have not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not wish to take the gentleman from Texas off the floor.

Mr. CRAIN. I will reply to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee by reading to him the language of the report:

General Meagher was breveted major-general about the close of the war, and was accidentally drowned shortly after, while on his way with troops to quell an Indian disturbance in Montana Territory, of which he was then acting governor.

That would seem to indicate that at the time of his death he was in command of United States troops as a brevet major-general of the Army.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What appears to confuse an understanding of the facts is the statement that he was governor of Montana.

Mr. BRADY. He was never actually governor of Montana.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand from the reading of this report that General Meagher was at the time of his death in command of troops. If he was, the existing laws entitle his widow to receive a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. NELSON. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that, as governor, or acting governor, of the Territory of Montana, General Meagher was, ex officio, commander-in-chief of the troops called out to quell that Indian disturbance, and was technically in the service of the United States.

Mr. TAULBEE. If that be true I would like to ask why his widow has not applied for a pension under existing laws?

Mr. BRADY. I can answer that Mrs. Meagher was the daughter of Mr. Townsend, of New York, a very wealthy man in his lifetime; but recently her father has died, and she is left dependent and in needy circumstances. During the lifetime of her father it was not necessary for her to apply to the Government for a pension, and she did not apply.

Mr. LOUTTIT. But if she had done so she would have received up to the present time nearly $8,000.

Mr. TAULBEE. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] has made that statement, I wish to ask why she has not applied since the death of her father?

A MEMBER. She is applying now.

Mr. BRADY. Because she prefers applying to Congress and because Congress has granted to the widows of a number of general officers pensions at the rate of $50 a month. Had she applied to the Pension Bureau she would have got only $30 a month.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then it is apparent, Mr. Chairman, that the legislation to which I have been objecting is of such a character that it leads applicants for relief to pass by the Pension Office, to ignore the laws made for their benefit to and appeal direct to Congress.

They refuse to avail themselves of the benefits to which the laws of the country entitle them, from the simple fact that the sentiment which has led the House of Representatives and the Senate to indulge in this extravagance has held out inducements to them to apply direct to Congress. If we are thus to supersede the Pension Office, the operations of which are maintained at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, let us repeal the pension laws and abolish the Pension Bureau and let us advertise to the country that Congress is ready to respond to the appeals of all who desire money out of the Treasury of the United States in amounts commensurate, not with their merits or necessities but with their aspirations and desires. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that a more vicious kind of legislation could not be adopted.

If the widow of this officer, however gallant he may have been, has a remedy under existing laws, let that remedy be exhausted before she comes to Congress.

Mr. BRADY. Is it not a fact that the widow of General Hancock applied directly to Congress and got a pension without going to the Pension Bureau?

Mr. MORRILL. And how about Cummins Porter? Did he apply to the Pension Bureau before coming to Congress?

Mr. TAULBEE. The application of Mrs. Hancock was made direct to Congress.

Mr. BRADY. So is this.

Mr. TAULBEE. And in that case of Mrs. Hancock we find a precedent for this; but I opposed that on principle, and so I oppose this on principle.

So far as the question of my colleague on the committee [Mr. MORRILL] is concerned, with reference to the pension of Cummins Porter, whose bill was introduced by me without his having applied to the Pension Office for relief, I have this to say: In the first place, the pension granted to him was granted upon an examination by a board of surgeons of the Pension Office.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one other question?

Mr. TAULBEE. In a moment, when I get through with this. Furthermore, there was no exception made in his case, so far as the rating of the pension was concerned.

The bill granted Cummins Porter a pension according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, without designating any amount whatever. The board rated him at $50 per month. The reason why his application was made direct to Congress is doubtless fresh in the mind of my colleague on the committee [Mr. MORRILL]. It was simply this: Cummins Porter had been for fifteen years in the almshouse of the county in which I live.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, we do not want to wait until they get to the almshouse.

Mr. TAULBEE. He had been a soldier in the heavy artillery of the State of Ohio.

A MEMBER. Why did he not apply to the Pension Office?

Mr. TAULBEE. I am proceeding to answer that. The evidence upon which he could obtain relief was to be found in the State of Ohio, and I am proceeding to show that his case was not analogous to the one under consideration.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Not just like it, but something like it.

Mr. TAULBEE. No, it is dissimilar in almost every feature.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That was a case based on equitable considerations, and so is this.

Mr. TAULBEE. The poverty and total helplessness of Cummins Porter prevented him from procuring the indispensable evidence upon which he must rely for obtaining his pension at the Pension Bureau; and as I stated before the committee when they were considering this case, so I state now, that I was in the court of the county in which he lived when the presiding judge and full bench proposed to the only pension attorney in my county that they would pay him an extraordinary amount if he would proceed to develop, by testimony, the rights of the claimant, Cummins Porter. But the attorney very properly declined, stating to the court that it was a criminal offense for him to receive more than $25 for prosecuting an application for pension. For this reason Cummins Porter never applied at the Pension Office for a pension. The reasons existing in his case were just and fair reasons; such as commend themselves to every gentleman who is acquainted with the facts.

But this case is different. Here there are no reasons shown why the applicant did not apply for a pension under the existing laws; there are no reasons shown why she would be entitled to a pension even at the rate of $30 per month if she should elect to apply at the Pension Office.

But if the construction of this report given by the gentlemen who advocate this bill is correct, I say that such legislation as this encourages direct applications to Congress and piles in upon this House and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, of which I have the honor to be a member, more work than we could do if we should sit in constant session year after year.

Mr. BRADY. Will the gentleman allow me a moment right here? Does not the record show that in thirty or forty cases pensions have been granted by Congress to the widows of general officers? And is it not a fact that in no case under existing laws can the widow of such officer receive a pension of more than $30, except by application to Congress? Does not the gentleman know that this application is supported by precedent upon precedent, and case upon case, some of the cases not being of equal merit with that now under consideration?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not know that, Mr. Chairman; but I grant——

Mr. BRADY. If the gentleman, as a member of the committee, does not know that, he is not familiar with the action of the committee and the legislation of Congress with regard to pensions.

Mr. TAULBEE. The gentleman begs the question. I say I do not know that pensions have been granted in cases less meritorious than this. I do know that in numbers of cases pensions of this kind have been granted; and I have objected to such action when I had the opportunity, because I foresaw the very thing which has occurred, as illustrated by the question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY]—that our extravagance in that regard would be assigned as a reason for extraordinary allowances of this kind in cases where some member of Congress might deem it proper to interest himself in the well-being of the widow of some general officer of the Army.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him, for the information of others as well as myself, on what ground he bases his objection to this bill?

Mr. TAULBEE. I base my objection to it on the ground——

Mr. CRAIN. Because "No Irish need apply." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] for having anticipated me in what he perhaps may think would have been my answer. But I say that I make my objection to this bill on no such ground.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Do you not always object to Union soldiers getting pensions?

Mr. TAULBEE. I will answer the gentleman from Illinois in a few minutes. I will first say, in reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], that my objection to this bill is that the general laws of this country, apart from special legislation, do not provide for giving the widows of general officers of the Army a greater pension than $30 a month.

Mr. BRADY. We all understand that.

Mr. TAULBEE. That is my objection, and a very tenable one.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understand, then, that the gentleman——

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I have several questions on my list to which I desire to reply. Will the gentleman content himself for a moment? I am perfectly willing to yield for questions, but I must be permitted to answer them as I proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes the committee will be in order and will allow the gentleman from Kentucky to proceed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I supposed the gentleman desired to let us know what he is driving at.

Mr. TAULBEE. I propose to do so, if the gentleman will only "possess his soul in patience" and give me an opportunity to state my objections to the bill.

I do not consider, Mr. Chairman, that any fair mind can hold that I should assume the burden in opposing this bill. On the contrary, a simple statement that no reason has been shown why this should be made an exceptional case is, it appears to me, a good objection to the measure. In this matter I am on the defensive.

As to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD], who asks me whether I do not always oppose pensioning Union soldiers, I certainly can not think that gentleman (for whom I have the highest regard) was sincere in that question. I believe the records will bear me witness, I believe my colleagues on the committee and those who have attended these Friday night sessions will testify, that I have been, at least, just in the advocacy of every bill which I believed to possess merit; and when you come to a case where you propose to pension some poor soldier who can not receive a pension under the general law because of some technical reasons why he can not comply with the straight-laced requirements of the Pension Office, no man is more liberal, no man is more ready than I am to grant a pension when the bill provides that the pension shall be "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. PETTIBONE and others. That is true.

Mr. TAULBEE. And in the case of widows, I have often supported bills this House has passed. I have antagonized the President in his veto of bills which I thought had merit, but which he believed had not. Then, Mr. Chairman, in the face of these facts as sustained by the record I must confess some degree of surprise that a gentleman with the sagacity of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] should ask such a question as the one he has propounded to me.

I believe that ample pensions ought to be granted, but I say it is an injustice to allow the pension system to indulge in these extravagances which are calculated to throw upon it the odium of all right-thinking people everywhere when we are thus carried away by our sympathies.

And speaking of extravagances in pension legislation, my mind naturally reverts to the extravagance demonstrated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], who not many days ago introduced into this House a bill proposing to put on the pension-roll of this country the retired clerks of the Departments and other civil employés of the Government at a rate far above that granted either to soldiers who were wounded in battle or to the widows of soldiers.

Mr. CRAIN. Does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do.

Mr. CRAIN. Is it not a fact you came to me and asked me to-day whether I favored that bill, and is it not another fact that I told you I had introduced it by request and was opposed to it? [Laughter.] And did you not put your arm around me and say you thanked God I was not for it? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I did ask the gentleman why he had introduced that bill, and he said it was by request. But that does not change the fact that he did introduce it.

Mr. CRAIN. Only by request, and said I was opposed to it. Did I not tell you so?

Mr. TAULBEE. I am glad the gentleman is opposed to it.

Mr. CRAIN. And when I said I was opposed to it, the gentleman from Kentucky hugged me and thanked God that I was opposed to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not remember the exact words, but I think the gentleman's fancy has led him into statements concerning matters about which he can not afford to be so definite.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman think this is discussing the bill before the committee? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAULBEE. Did I not notify gentlemen, before I took the floor, if they had reasons to advance in support of this bill, they had better present them?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The reasons are in the report.

Mr. TAULBEE. But the reasons cited in the report are exceptional.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We think otherwise.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire, as I have said, to call the attention of the House and the country to the facts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman's discussion cast any light on the merits of this case?

Mr. TAULBEE. I have not been attempting to cast any light on the case. I am on the other side.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any minority report in this case?

Mr. BRADY. No; it is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. CRAIN. And in keeping with the recommendation of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 4.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WINANS. I move that the committee rise; and before the vote is taken I suggest, by unanimous consent, it be understood the list of recognitions the Chair has for to-night shall be followed next Friday night.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not within the province of the committee, but the Chair will preserve the list.

Mr. WINAN'S motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. OUTHWAITE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had the special order under consideration and had directed him to report to the House sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4745) granting a pension to William S. Bewley;

A bill (H. R. 7732) for the relief of Franz Rossrucker;

A bill (H. R. 10093) for the relief of Elizabeth Glassbrener and Mary Glassbrener;

A bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to Minerva Abbey;

A bill (H. R. 6027) granting a pension to William McFadden;

A bill (H. R. 8818) granting a pension to Frederick Dierking;

A bill (H. R. 306) granting a pension to George Schneider;

A bill (H. R. 10025) granting a pension to Clementine Hartinger;

A bill (H. R. 10104) granting a pension to Caroline L. Shedd; and

A bill (H. R. 8720) granting a pension to William B. Eve.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were severally considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4535) granting a pension to Adelisa Perry;

A bill (H. R. 9401) granting a pension to H. H. Dodd; and

A bill (H. R. 10082) to increase the pension of Margaret R. Jones.

ELIZABETH M. J. MEAGHER.

The bill (H. R. 8463) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. J. Meagher, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment, was considered and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move that the bill just read be laid upon the table.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Would not the gentleman agree to let this bill go over to a full House?

Mr. TAULBEE. I should prefer to have action taken upon it now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the Senate of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to a third reading, and were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (S. 2220) granting a pension to James G. Mathes;

A bill (S. 2369) granting a pension to William H. H. Price; and

A bill (S. 2335) for the relief of the heirs of Malitty Rose.

Bills of the Senate of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were considered, the amendments concurred in, and the bills as amended ordered to be read a third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (S. 2301) granting a pension to Lucy E. Anderson; and

A bill (S. 2098) for the relief of Rosella E. Hibbert.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the several votes taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Senate bills of the following titles, for the removal of political disabilities, were severally considered, ordered to be read a third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) namely:

A bill (S. 2721) to remove the political disabilities of John K. Mitchell; and

A bill (S. 2848) for the relief of Benjamin P. Loyall.

The bill (H. R. 9854) to remove the political disabilities of S. Barron, of Virginia, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

And then, on motion of Mr. WINANS (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 22, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FOG-SIGNAL AT SPECTACLE REEF.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation of $15,000 to build a proper foundation for the fog-signal structure at Spectacle Reef light-station, Lake Huron; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, communicating a list of persons employed in the Navy Department during the calendar year 1886, and the time each was actually employed, and the sum paid each; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

CLERICAL FORCE IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior inclosing an additional estimate of appropriations for clerical force in his Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House joint resolution (S. R. 94) ordering the printing of the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

WILLIAM ERVIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, with House amendments, and directed the reading of the message from the Senate in relation thereto, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. SPOONER, Mr. DOLPH, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request for a conference will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will in the course of the day appoint the managers on the part of the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WADE, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. BENNETT, for one day, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BOYLE, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw the papers of Jeremiah T. Reed, without leaving copies.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 2589) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River at Saint Louis, Mo.; and

A bill (S. 9) to fix the day of meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for regulating the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 10802) making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I reserve all points of order.

OATH OF OFFICE, HON. D. WYATT AIKEN.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report in writing as to the administration of the oath of office to Hon. D. Wyatt Aiken, recommending that the preamble and resolution on that subject, submitted by Mr. DIBBLE on January 10, 1887, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, be amended and adopted in the following form:

Whereas D. Wyatt Aiken, Representative for the State of South Carolina, from the third district thereof, has been, and in all probability will remain until the end of this Congress, unable, from sickness, to appear in person to be sworn as a member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed the oath of office before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said D. Wyatt Aiken as a member of this House.

Mr. HAMMOND. I think it is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, to read the report now. I ask that it be printed, and I shall call it up some time next week. I desire also to state that Mr. BENNETT, of North Carolina, who is unwell to-day, desires the privilege of filing the views of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed, and laid on the table, and being a privileged matter, it may be called up at any time.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also submitted the following report:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 17, 1887.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to inform this House by what legal authority the directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company consolidated that company with the Kansas Pacific Railway Company and the Denver Pacific Railway Company and reorganized the same under the name of the Union Pacific Railway Company; and by what legal authority the last named company issued the $24,000,000 of the capital stock of said company in addition to the capital stock of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; and also by what legal authority the Union Pacific Railway Company issued two trust loans amounting to $10,883,000; and whether the said Union Pacific Railroad Company has any legal existence.

The object of the resolution is to obtain the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States as to the law of certain matters touching the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

It seems probable that all those questions may be examined and answered under the joint resolution (H. Res. 170) which passed the House on the 18th of January, 1887 (see RECORD, page 774), should the commission thereby called for be appointed.

But, be that as it may, section 354 of the Revised Statutes says: "The Attorney-General shall give his advice and opinions upon questions of law whenever required by the President." That is the statute of 24th September, 1789 (vol. 1, U. S. Stat., 92). It was enlarged in 1870 so as to make it the duty of the Attorney-General to give such opinions to the head of any Executive Department "on any questions of law arising in the administration of his Department." (Revised Statutes, section 356; 16 U. S. Stat., 163.)

For seventy years from Wirt to Garland, without break or hesitation, the Department of Justice has held that the Attorney-General could not legally give such opinions when called on by any other persons or body whomsoever. Accordingly the refusals to answer when called on by Congress or its committees have been uniform. Those wishing to examine the satisfactory reasons for that construction are referred to 1 Attorney-General's Opinions, 211; ib., 253 and 335, and to like opinions in almost every volume of those opinions.

Your committee therefore recommend that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. HAMMOND. The matter with which the report deals is so well settled that I do not suppose there can be any controversy about it. I understand, however, that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] desires to say a word on the subject of the resolution before the subject is disposed of, and I therefore yield him five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I shall need the whole five minutes in which to say that, subsequent to the introduction of that resolution of inquiry and its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, an amendment offered by me, covering many of the points contained in it, was embodied in the resolution for the appointment of a commission to investigate the affairs of the Union Pacific Railway, and, during the investigation by that commission, the body being directly under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary can, under existing statutes, obtain from the Attorney-General precisely the information which was contemplated by the resolution of inquiry. So that, so far as I am concerned, I do not now care, owing to the action just referred to, whether this resolution be laid on the table or not.

I wish simply to add that, in view of the statute cited in the report, providing that opinions may be required from the Attorney-General by the heads of the Executive Departments, it seems to me a pretty broad assumption to claim that Congress, which enacted that statute and which created the office of Attorney-General, may not if it sees fit request an opinion from that officer. In other words, I am now simply entering a general demurrer, as a layman, to the proposition which has been maintained for many years in practice, that an Attorney-General shall not give an opinion to this House if the House sees fit to call for it. This is all I have to say.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy any time in disposing of this matter. The reasons why the Attorney-General can not give any opinions except those required by law are so numerous and so potent that any gentleman, lawyer, or layman who will read the authorities on the subject can be perfectly satisfied about the matter.

I call for a vote on the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to lay the resolution on the table?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2929) to amend the act dividing the State of Missouri into two judicial districts, and to divide the eastern and western districts thereof into divisions, establish district and circuit courts of the United States therein, and provide for the times and places for holding such courts, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BURNES. This bill has already been under consideration, and was then read. It will be found published in the proceedings of the House of May 24 last. I ask that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that request if the gentleman will make a statement as to the effect of the bill, and inform us whether it creates any new offices.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I shall have to object to the consideration of this bill by unanimous consent, for the reason that my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who is much interested in this matter, is at home now on account of sickness in his family. I think the bill ought not to be taken up by unanimous consent in his absence.

DIVORCE STATISTICS.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a memorial from the late general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in regard to the collection and publication of statistics, &c., on the subject of divorce. The memorial is very brief. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DUNN. I ask that a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas in regard to legislation on the subject of interstate commerce may also go into the RECORD, and be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the two memorials will be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There was no objection.

The following memorial, presented by Mr. HOLMAN, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

At the late general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, held in Chicago in October last, the undersigned were appointed a committee by the house of deputies to call the attention of Congress to the great importance of the collection and publication of reliable statistics and useful information on the subject of divorce.

In fulfillment of that duty, therefore, they respectfully set forth:

First. That in view of the great variety and laxity in the present divorce laws of the several States and Territories, some reform is imperatively needed looking toward uniformity and increased stringency, both in defining the proper grounds for a divorce and in regulating the practical administration of the divorce laws in our several courts.

Second. That as a proper and necessary basis for wise legislation on this subject it is essential that more extensive and reliable information be obtained as to the present existing laws on this subject, the nature and extent of the evils arising under them, and the most practical and efficient remedies therefor.

Third. That no legislative body can so thoroughly and satisfactorily gather the required statistics on this subject throughout the entire country as the Congress of the United States.

On behalf, therefore, of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, the undersigned respectfully petition your honorable body to take such action as will best secure this desirable result.

JOHN H. ELLIOTT.
EDMUND H. BENNETT.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 4, 1887.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Arkansas, presented by Mr. DUNN, was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, Little Rock, Ark.

I, E. B. Moore, secretary of state of Arkansas, do hereby certify that the annexed pages contain a true, complete, and full copy of house concurrent resolution No. 1, of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, approved January 18, 1887, as appears by comparing the same with the original roll of said concurrent resolutions now on file in this office.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at Little Rock, this 18th day of January, A. D. 1887.

[SEAL.] E. B. MOORE, Secretary of State.

House concurrent resolution No. 1.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, STATE OF ARKANSAS,
Little Rock, Ark.

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Arkansas (the senate concurring), That our Senators be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to vote for and to use all honorable means to secure the passage of the interstate-commerce bill as reported by the committee of conference now pending before Congress.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state furnish our Senators and Representatives in Congress with a copy of these resolutions.

Approved January 18, 1887.

LIGHT AT ENTRANCE OF PORTAGE LAKE HARBOR OF REFUGE.

Mr. CUTCHEON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10803) to establish a light at the entrance to Portage Lake Harbor of Refuge, on the east shore of Lake Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

UNLAWFUL INCLOSURES OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. PAYSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Whereas Congress, by the act approved February 25, 1885 (23 Stats. at Large, page 321), prohibited any and all inclosures of public lands, except held under claim of title made in good faith, and the Secretary of the Interior shows in his last annual report to the President, dated November 1, 1886, that notwithstanding the provisions of said act the practice of unlawfully inclosing large areas of the public lands still continues, and the Secretary, in said report, suggests that "it is to some extent a matter of doubt whether the prohibitory provision of the law covers these cases, though I am of opinion that it does; and should there be any doubt in the mind of Congress upon the point, additional legislation will be needed."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be required to procure the opinion of the Attorney-General for the use of this House whether, to reach the cases cited by the Secretary of the Interior, especially as to lands in the granted limits of railroad land grants, any further legislation is needed.

REPORT ON NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr FARQUHAR, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the following resolution:

Resolved, That 1,000 additional copies of the annual report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers be printed for the use of the members of the House of Representatives and the board of managers.

The report, which was read, states that the estimated cost of printing is $106.75.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW ORLEANS, BATON ROUGE AND VICKSBURG RAILROAD GRANT.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. LAFFOON, as a privileged report from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with the amendments of the Senate, the bill (H. R. 3186) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands have had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3186) entitled "A bill to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, to confirm title to certain lands, and for other purposes," and the Senate amendments thereto, and recommend that the House concur in the said amendments.

Mr. LAFFOON. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 2 strike out all after "New Orleans," in line 1, down to and including "railroads," in line 3, and insert:

"Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior, October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road and still remaining in their possession, or in the possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States;" so that the section will read:

"That the title of the United States and of the original grantee to the lands granted by said act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to said grantee, the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, not herein declared forfeited, is relinquished, granted, conveyed, and confirmed to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, as the assignee of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company, said lands to be located in accordance with the maps filed by said New Orleans Pacific Railway Company in the Department of the Interior October 27, 1881, and November 17, 1882, which indicate the definite location of said road: Provided, That all said lands occupied by actual settlers at the date of the definite location of said road, and still remaining in their possession or in the possession of their heirs or assigns, shall be held and deemed excepted from said grant, and shall be subject to entry under the public-land laws of the United States."

In section 3, line 7, after the word "and," strike out the words "fully discharged" and insert in lieu thereof the words "agreed to discharge;" so as to read:

"That the relinquishment of the lands and the confirmation of the grant provided for in the second section of this act are made and shall take effect whenever the Secretary of the Interior is notified that said New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, through the action of a majority of its stockholders, has accepted the provisions of this act, and is satisfied that said company has accepted and agreed to discharge all the duties and obligations imposed upon the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad Company by the act of March 3, 1871, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes.'"

On page 3, line 22, after "the," insert "second, third."

On page 3, line 25, strike out the words "Blanchard-Robinson agreement" and insert in lieu thereof the words "sections of this act;" so as to read:

"And to protect any and all settlers on said lands in all their rights under the said sections of this act."

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that these amendments have not been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER (after examining the amendments). The Chair does not see in these amendments any provision which would, under the rules of the House, take them to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, there is a new provision, is there not?

The SPEAKER. But it does not make any appropriation or require any to be made, or donate any public property, or release any liability to the Government, or impose any tax.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, the amendment of the Senate of itself does not have that effect, but it has the effect of changing the terms upon which the appropriation of public property is to be made from the terms contained in the bill as it originally passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it comes within the rule of the House which requires consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee on this bill.

The SPEAKER. It will be read. The Chair will state that the report on this amendment has been read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to say that the effect of this bill is to confirm a grant by Congress, instead of forfeiting one.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana to claim that this confirms a grant?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Instead of forfeiting it?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the effect of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill confirms the grant, and should never have been passed in the first place.

Mr. PAYSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. KING. It is a bill that has already been passed by the House.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky, in charge of the bill, will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LAFFOON. I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to take only three minutes to explain the amendment of the Senate.

That amendment to this forfeiture bill does nothing more nor less than to protect the settlers a little better than they were protected in the bill as it passed the House. That, I repeat, is the only effect of the amendment, and I hope the House will concur with the Senate.

Mr. LAFFOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield now two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to say, sir, that the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana is correct. The bill is better than when it passed the House; that is to say, it protects the rights of the settlers better. But at the same time the bill as it passed the House and the bill as it now stands before the House on the Senate amendment is a bill to confirm the Backbone Railroad land grant.

Mr. DUNN. It confirms a part and forfeits a part.

Mr. HOLMAN. It confirms it in substance. The exception is, however, of very little public moment.

The object of the bill, as I understand it, is to confirm that grant. I admit that when the bill was before the House, in the Forty-eighth Congress, I believe, it contemplated the forfeiture of that grant and was defeated. But I think it was done under a misapprehension as to the real condition of the original grant and the claim set up by the railroad.

Mr. NELSON. Let me interrupt the gentleman to ask this question: If it is not true that this bill confirms a land grant for building a road where it was never intended to be built?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. It being built on the other side of the river from that contemplated in the grant.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman is mistaken. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me for a few minutes longer.

Mr. LAFFOON. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply conforms to a recommendation made by the Secretary of the Interior in his former annual report, that, if there be any defect (not that there is any), but if there be any defect in the title of the railroad company to this land grant, Congress pass a bill to cure it.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. In the original grant, on which side of the river was this road to be built?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will tell the gentleman. This was originally a grant of land to aid in the construction of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburg Railroad. That company was to build a road partly on the east side of the Mississippi River and partly on the west side of that river, to wit: from Baton Rouge to the Texas line. This bill forfeits the land on the east side of the river, where the road was not built; but on the west side of the river, where the road has long since been constructed, it confirms the land to the road, and to that part of it only.

Mr. HOLMAN. But not built within the terms as to time fixed by Congress in the grant.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was constructed after the time fixed in the granting act, it is true; but it was long before Congress took steps equivalent to a re-entry of the land.

Mr. HOLMAN. Which granting act contained the emphatic declaration that if the road was not built—was not completed—in five years the land should be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was built before any forfeiture was declared. No forfeiture has ever been declared, and this bill only confirms to the railroad that portion of the land coterminous with the portion of the road actually constructed.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the Secretary of the Interior preceding the present Secretary of the Interior issued patents as early as March, 1885, covering nearly 700,000 acres of this land to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad Company, claimant of this grant.

Mr. HOLMAN. And during the twenty-four hours immediately before the expiration of his term of office.

Mr. BLANCHARD. And he patented it upon the written opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States that the title to the land was in the railroad company, and upon the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-eighth Congress to the same effect.

That committee, in a report concurred in by thirteen out of fifteen, drawn by the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, held that the titles to these lands were in this railroad company, and that a forfeiture could not be declared in law, and should not be declared in equity.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Has the portion of the road on the east side of the river from Baton Rouge down ever been built?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It has not been built from Baton Rouge to New Orleans by this company on the east side of the river, but from New Orleans to Baton Rouge on the west side it is constructed. For that portion of the road no land whatever is given in this bill, but for the line of road from Baton Rouge to the Texas boundary land is given in the bill in pursuance of the original granting act.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And that is not on the line indicated in the original granting act?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is directly on a part of the line.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know what part of the lands this act refers to has gone into the hands of settlers, and what portion is still retained by the railroad company?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, that this bill provides for the protection of the settlers in this way: that all settlers who were upon this land grant up to the date of definite location of the road, to wit, October, 1881, are allowed to take their lands from the United States Government under the homestead law, and from 1881, the date of definite location, down to a certain date in the year 1884, the settlers are protected by what is called the Blanchard-Robertson agreement, which gives them better terms than they could obtain from the Government of the United States if they purchased lands in the sections reserved to the Government. The Government price is $2.50 an acre, whereas the Blanchard-Robertson agreement allows the settlers to take their lands at $2 an acre, one-third cash, balance in one and two years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the money go to the railroad company?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Up to the date of definite location it would go to the Government; after that to the railroad company.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Louisiana has stated, as I understand, that a large part of these lands are patented.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir; nearly 700,000 acres.

Mr. BLOUNT. By the action of the Secretary of the Interior, under the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir; and by the action of this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know how much of those lands is in possession of the railroad at this time, and how much has been sold by the railroad company.

Mr. BLANCHARD. My information about that is not very great. The railroad company have sold portions of the land already patented to it. The greater part of it, perhaps, still remains in possession of the railroad company.

The patent was not issued in 1885 until this question had been discussed elaborately in this House, in the Forty-eighth Congress, and this House had deliberately voted down the proposition to forfeit the grant by 43 majority.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me one other question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I understand the gentleman to admit that this road was built out of time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. And that this bill confirms a grant to an assignee company, and not the company to which the original grant was made.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is correct. And I will state upon the point of the assignment of the grant that the Attorney-General of the United States decided the assignment was valid and vested a legal title in the assignee company; and the Judiciary Committee of this House decided the same thing.

Mr. HOLMAN. What Attorney-General?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Brewster, the Attorney-General of the United States preceding the present one.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. In that part of the Senate amendment which refers, not to the additional security given to settlers, but, as I understand it, to a change in the location of the lands affected by that part of the House bill which went on to describe the land the title to which was confirmed, certain words are stricken out which refer to a certain map filed at a certain time, and then other words are inserted which appear to refer to another map filed at another time. Apparently they make reference to another set of lands. I only ask for information as to that part of the Senate amendment which does not include the proviso for settlers—the first part ot the Senate amendment, which makes a change in the lands which are referred to on page 2 of this bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will state to the gentleman that the Senate amendments were adopted upon the motion of the senior Senator from Louisiana, who offered them after consultation with myself and other gentlemen, and that the only effect of those amendments is to give to the settlers upon the land-grant better terms than they would obtain under the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Does not the amendment change the description or definition of the lands affected by the bill?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It does not.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It appeared to me that it did.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The amendments have been considered by the House Committee on Public Lands, and that committee make a unanimous report here recommending that the House concur.

Nine-tenths, perhaps nineteen-twentieths, of this land-grant lie in the district I have the honor to represent. This matter has disturbed three Congresses, to wit, the Forty-seventh, the Forty-eighth, and the Forty-ninth; the settlers are in a state of indecision and confusion about their titles, and it is time now for Congress to put an end to this state of things by doing something, one way or the other, with this land-grant. This House in the Forty-eighth Congress deliberately refused, by a majority of forty-three, to forfeit this land grant. The question came again before the House in the first session of the present Congress, and, by a practically unanimous vote, this bill was passed. It went to the Senate, and that body merely added an amendment the effect of which is to give better protection to the settlers; and it is that proposition on which the House is now asked to vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill was clearly passed under a misapprehension by the House. It was not understood.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Everybody understood it except the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. If that gentleman did not post himself as to what the bill was, it was his own fault, and he should not be charging here now that this bill passed the House under false pretenses.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the House generally understood it to be the original bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] state that this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I so understand.

Mr. LAFFOON. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, when the policy involved in this bill was first presented to this Congress by the Committee on Public Lands in the Atlantic and Pacific forfeiture bill I opposed its adoption. In the committee and in the House I sought to have a different policy adopted for the treatment of such forfeitures. I got but little encouragement here, and not a great deal in the committee. The House saw fit to adopt over my objection the policy of this bill, which I opposed. I also voted against this bill on its final passage. The Atlantic and Pacific bill, this bill, and others containing even less equity than this were passed. That was the time to make the fight now sought to be made here. The bill has passed the House; the Senate has amended it in very slight particulars. The only effect of the amendments, as I understand them, is to secure some additional rights to the settlers upon these lands. Now, we can do only one of two things, either concur or non-concur in the amendments. There is no disagreement between the two Houses as to the bad features of the bill. The amendments, as I understand them, are in the right direction. Shall we commit another mistake because of the first made by the House?

If we non-concur the probabilities are that the Senate will recede from the amendments, and then we must take the bill as it passed the House without the additional protection that the amendments will give the settlers. Since the lands have been lost to the Government we ought to do all we can to help the settlers. It appears to me that the question for us to determine is whether we will do that or not. It is not a question whether or not we did wrong in passing the bill in the first instance. Upon that question I was then and am still satisfied. When this bill was upon its passage here I called the attention of the House at that time to the policy involved in it, but the House did as it had done with the Atlantic and Pacific bill and passed it.

When the Senate amendment to the Atlantic and Pacific was pending the House refused to hear me, and sustained the demand of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] for the previous question. At that time I could not even get enough members to stand up to get a yea-and-nay vote upon that amendment, which had the effect to cut off the last chance of the United States. The question for us now is not whether we did wrong then, but whether we will now do justice to the settlers by giving them the protection which the Senate has sought to give them by the amendments. It is now too late to save any of the lands; that time passed when the House passed the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not my friend see the propriety of asking for another conference upon this bill, so that what was not intended to be done—the confirmation of a great land grant—shall not be done?

Mr. MCRAE. There has been no conference. But I do not understand that any good is to be accomplished by non-concurring, because there is no disagreement upon that part of the bill which confirms title to the railroad.

Mr. HOLMAN. And asking a further conference.

Mr. LAFFOON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Would a motion be in order now to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I make that motion.

Mr. LAFFOON. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LAFFOON] demanded the previous question. That, of course, took him off the floor, and, pending that demand, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] moves to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 53.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LAFFOON].

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays in order to settle this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 143, not voting 100; as follows:

So the motion to refer the amendments of the Senate to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to announce that I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] until Monday next. If he were present I should vote in the affirmative on this question.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. WISE with Mr. NEGLEY, for three days.

Mr. VIELE with Mr. DAVENPORT, until Monday next.

The following-named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. BARRY with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.

Mr. THROCKMORTON with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HISCOCK.

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. COBB with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. WEST.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. SWINBURNE.

Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. REESE with Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. HIRES.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. BENNETT with Mr. HANBACK.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, with Mr. GILFILLAN.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. MERRIMAN with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. BLAND with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. DORSEY.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on ordering the previous question upon concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the amendments of the Senate be concurred in?

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If these amendments of the Senate be now concurred in, does that action pass this bill?

The SPEAKER. That will complete the consideration of the matter between the two Houses, and the bill will then be enrolled.

Mr. HOLMAN. I therefore ask the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to vote advisedly on this question, and would like consent to put an inquiry to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I hope consent will be granted.

Mr. ROGERS. I object.

Mr. HEPBURN. The inquiry I desire to put hinges directly upon this question.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being ayes 37, noes 127—more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. As there are several amendments, the Chair desires to ask whether a separate vote on these amendments is demanded.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask that the amendments be again read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments; after which any member will have an opportunity to demand a separate vote.

The amendments were again read.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on these amendments? [A pause.] In the absence of such demand, the question will be taken on concurring in the amendments in gross.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 151, nays 61, not voting 106; as follows:

So the amendments were concurred in.

During the roll-call Mr. COWLES said: I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BENNETT] is detained from the House by illness.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LAFFOON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION IN PATENT CASES.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks on the bill (H. R. 4458) to limit the jurisdiction of United States courts in patent cases, and to protect persons who, without notice, are bona fide manufacturers, purchasers, venders, and users of articles, machines, machinery, and other things for the exclusive use, manufacture, or sale of which a patent has been or may hereafter be granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask, by unanimous consent, that gentlemen having reports to submit may be recognized, and that the formal calling of committees for reports be dispensed with.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. TURNER. I am directed by the Committee on Elections to report back a bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections, and to move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in at this time.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that will be done.

There was no objection.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 14, after "elections," insert "and the same shall be kept by him in the Capitol;" page 2, line 12, after "testimony," insert "to be printed;" page 2, line 13, after "printed," insert "as he shall determine;" and strike out section 2.

The Senate amendments were non-concurred in.

Mr. TURNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEWIS COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back a bill (H. R. 6357) to approve an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, entitled "An act to establish the charter and enlarge and improve the corporation of Lewis Collegiate Institute," approved February 4, 1885; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

VALIDATION OF AN ACT OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Territories, also reported back a bill (H. R. 7857) to validate an act of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Territories, also reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 5080) to facilitate the settlement and to develop the resources of the Territory of Alaska, and to open an overland communication therewith; and

A bill (H. R. 6941) to amend section 1889 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the Legislative Assemblies of Territories creating corporations.

FEES, UNITED STATES COURTS, ETC.

Mr. PERRY, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back a bill (H. R. 10351) to extend the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1883, and section 837 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to submit a resolution as a question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been stated in the public prints, and is no doubt true, that the President and Senate have agreed to and ratified a convention by which the terms of the treaty made between the United States and the Government of the Hawaiian Islands on the 30th day of January, 1875, have been extended for seven years longer, and beyond the period limited for its operation by the original treaty; and

Whereas by the original treaty it was agreed that certain articles therein mentioned were to be admitted to the United States free of duty; and

Whereas the original treaty was, by its terms, subject to the confirmation of an act of Congress, which provision is not inserted in the convention said to have been ratified: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the facts hereinbefore recited, and to report to this House whether the treaty which involves the rate of duty to be imposed on any article or the admission of any article free of duty can be valid and binding without the concurrence of the House of Representatives and how far the power conferred on the House by the Constitution of the United States to originate measures to lay and collect duties can be controlled by the treaty-making power under said Constitution.

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the House, if consistent with the public welfare, a copy of the treaty or convention proposed to the Senate and ratified by that body between the United States and the Government of the Hawaiian Islands.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary may report at any time under the foregoing resolution.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be necessary for me to go at length into the reasons which prompt me to offer this resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order upon that resolution as not being privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will submit the question without remarks and take the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana does affect the privileges of this House.

It recites that the Executive Department of the Government, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is undertaking to negotiate a treaty which will interfere with the revenues of the Government; and as the power to lay and collect duties is the province of Congress, this does become a privileged question, if that power is exercised by any other body without the assent of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. And it relates also to a subject in which the House originally took part.

Mr. WALLACE. I think if the gentleman will allow me to explain the reasons he will admit that this is a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule upon the question.

The only question now before the House is the point of order. The resolution directs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report how far the power conferred on the House by the Constitution of the United States to originate measures to lay and collect duties can be controlled by the treaty-making power under the Constitution. That is a question which involves the constitutional privileges and powers of the House to originate such measures; and the Chair thinks it has always been held to be a matter of privilege in the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand this is a request for the reference of the resolution; if that be so I have no objection to it.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; it is a request for immediate action upon it.

Mr. MILLS. It is an instruction to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I want to suggest to the gentleman from Louisiana an amendment by the addition of the words "as soon as possible," so that the Committee on the Judiciary will be instructed to report without delay.

Mr. WALLACE. I accept that.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MILLS, it was adopted.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, my object in offering this resolution is to call attention to the fact that a treaty, as it appears and as is generally accepted, has been adopted and ratified by the Senate. The original treaty required an act of Congress confirming the requirements of that treaty in its different clauses; but the treaty as adopted by the Senate, as it is understood, does not contain that clause, and undertakes to accomplish that without any request for confirmation on the part of the House. Inasmuch as it involves the admission into the United States of a large number of articles free of duty it certainly pertains to revenue; and as it involves matters relating to the revenue it is surely the right of the House to have something to say in regard to its ratification.

If that be not accepted as logical it would follow as a matter of course that under reciprocity treaties the Senate could take charge of all tariff matters without any reference whatever to the judgment of the House of Representatives. I therefore consider it a matter of serious moment affecting the privileges and rights of the House. And, on the resolution as read by the Clerk, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WALLACE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION FOR DEAFNESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the hour for the consideration of bills reported from committees. It begins at two minutes past 2 o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (H. R. 5871) granting an increase of the rate of pensions now provided for deafness.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa. The pending question on this bill is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to lay it aside with the recommendation that it be reported to the House for passage. The committee was dividing at the expiration of the last hour, the point being made that no quorum had voted. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, and Mr. CONGER resumed their places as tellers.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BURROWS. Would it not be well to have a roll-call, inasmuch as members do not seem to be voting on the Democratic side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain any motion.

Mr. BURROWS. The rule provides when there is no quorum, that the roll shall be called. It looks as if our Democratic friends are here but not going to vote. I would like to have the roll-call disclose that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce the fact that no quorum has yet voted.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask that the rule of the House be executed.

The CHAIRMAN. When the tellers have announced the result of the vote, the Chair will direct the enforcement of the rule.

The tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 0.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following-named members failed to answer:

Adams, J. J.	Cox, W. R.	Louttit,	Shaw,
Aiken,	Croxton,	Mahoney,	Skinner,
Anderson, C. M.	Davenport,	Matson,	Smalls,
Atkinson,	Dockery,	Maybury,	Spriggs,
Barry,	Dorsey,	McKinley,	Stephenson,
Belmont,	Ermentrout,	Merriman,	Stewart, J. W.

Cobb,	Kelley,	Riggs,	Wise,
Compton,	Ketcham,	Robertson,	Woodburn.
Comstock.	Laird,	Rusk,
Cox, S. S.	Lore,	Scott,

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5871) for granting an increase of the rate of pension now provided for deafness, and having found itself without a quorum, had directed the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The names of the absentees under the rule will be entered upon the Journal. From the roll-call it appears there are present 232 members, being more than a quorum. The committee will resume its session.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places. In view of the fact that many members have passed in and out since the tellers made their report the vote will be taken anew.

The affirmative vote was counted, and the tellers reported—ayes 105.

The CHAIRMAN. All who are opposed to the motion will now pass between the tellers.

After the lapse of some time,

Mr. BURROWS said: Can we not have the negative vote reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has announced that those opposed to the motion will pass between the tellers.

Mr. CONGER (one of the tellers). There is no negative vote. There does not seem to be any one opposed to the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. The Chairman on resuming the chair said that many members had passed in and out since the tellers reported. Perhaps the Chair will inform the committee whether the majority have passed out since the roll-call.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BURROWS. Perhaps it is as parliamentary as the statement of the Chair.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Would it be in order at this time to have one of the rules of the House read?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be if the gentleman raises any parliamentary question under a rule of the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. The first clause under Rule VIII requires members of the House to vote unless they have been previously excused. I suggest that the Chair direct the rule to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will designate the gentleman from Illinois to read it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the Clerk to read it. Let the Clerk read it in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a parliamentary question, and requests the reading of the rule which he has sent to the Clerk.

The Clerk read clause 1 of Rule VIII, as follows:

1. Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to ask a parliamentary question bearing upon that rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNHAM. Would it be in order at this time for the Chair to direct that the Clerk shall enter upon the records of this day's proceedings the names of the members who have just responded to the roll-call as present and now fail to vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The names of those who are present have already been entered on the Journal of the House. Under the rule, when the tellers report that no quorum has voted the Chair will direct the roll to be called again.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] if this matter cannot be compromised. If $20 a month or 66 cents a day for total deafness——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. If that is too much how much would gentlemen be willling to allow?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. They get enough now. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. PETERS. I should like to ask whether it is not a contempt of the House not to vote?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. No business is in order except passing between the tellers.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, in a case of this kind, where we are waiting for a quorum, is it not competent for the Chair to vote in order to make a quorum? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). Whenever the vote of the Chair will make a quorum the Chair will vote. Under the rules of the House the hour for the consideration of bills has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5871) granting an increase of the rate of pension now provided for deafness, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 106, noes 3.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to act as tellers.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish simply to say that if it was necessary to have a quorum in order to consider a pension bill which appropriated only $375,000 for totally deaf pensioners, I think it is necessary to have a quorum to consider a bill disposing of $7,500,000 for rivers and harbors.

The House again divided by tellers.

Mr. HAMMOND (before the count was completed). Mr. Speaker, I think we would save time by having the yeas and nays.
